Everybody who travels by railway knows that, as a general rule, persons arriving at a station with luggage are met at the entrance of the station by railway porters ready to receive their luggage, to take it to the platform, and to put it into the train. Everybody, too, knows that, while in ordinary course the heavier articles of luggage are labelled and placed in a van under the sole control and custody of the railway company, it is the common practice for passengers to take the lighter articles of luggage, or "hand luggage," as it was called, in the carriage with them. This practice is recognized by railway companies, who provide suitable receptacles for hand luggage in passenger carriages. And it is a practice as much for the convenience of railway companies as it is for the convenience of passengers.

It was contended by the appellants that, in receiving a passenger's luggage, railway porters, though in the service of the company, and forbidden to accept any payment from the public, must be taken to be acting on behalf of the passenger, and as his agents, and that this relation continues as regards van luggage until it is labelled for the journey, and as regards hand luggage until it is placed in the carriage in which the passenger intends to travel. Further, it was contended that the contract as regards van luggage is altogether distinct and different from the contract as regards hand luggage; that, in fact, there are two separate contracts, and that whatever may be the case as regards van luggage, the railway company comes under no liability of any sort as regards hand luggage until it is placed in the passenger's carriage.

I cannot think this view correct. The services rendered by railway porters in receiving passenger's luggage, in taking it to the platform, and putting it into the train, are part of the ordinary facilities for passenger traffic which the public nowadays expects from railway companies, and which railway companies for the most part hold themselves out as ready and willing to afford. These services are covered by the fare which the passenger pays for his journey. They are offered in view of the contract which a person who presents himself with luggage at a railway station presumably either has made or is about to make. The contract, as the case may be, runs from, or relates back to, the commencement of the journey, and the journey must, I think, be taken to commence, as regards passenger's luggage, at the time when the luggage is received by the company's servants for the purpose of the journey. Thenceforward the work done in taking the luggage to the platform, in putting it into the train, in conveying it to its destination, and there delivering it, must, I think, be regarded, under ordinary circumstances, as one continuous operation to be performed under the contract. The contract is the ordinary contract of common carriers—a contract to carry securely. The contract, no doubt, becomes modified as regards that part of the luggage which is put into the passenger's carriage. At the passenger's request, or at his instance, the company dispense with precautions which they think necessary for the safety of the goods they have undertaken to carry, and so the passenger relieves the company from some of the risks which otherwise would fall upon them. But, for all that, the contract is one contract, and in ordinary course, except so far as it may be modified by the acts or conduct of the passenger, it remains in force during the continuance of the journey, from its commencement to its end. If the reasoning in Bergheim v. Great Eastern Railway Co. seems to lead to a different conclusion, with all deference I am unable to concur in it. I prefer the view expressed by Willes, J., in Tulley v. Great Western Railway Co.

Your lordships are familiar with the evidence in the case, and I do not propose to repeat it. It is enough for the present to say that on the 24th of December, 1884, Mrs. Bunch went to Paddington with a Gladstone bag and some other luggage, meaning to travel with her husband by the 5 p.m. train to Bath. That on her arrival at the station the luggage was received by a porter in the employment of the company and taken by him to the platform for the purpose of the journey, and that the Gladstone bag was last seen on the platform with the same porter a few minutes afterwards. From that time all trace of the bag is lost. The porter and the bag vanish from the scene. It was suggested by the learned counsel for the appellants, by way of explanation, that the porter was possibly one of a number of men picked up by the company for the day to meet the pressure of Christmas traffic. But I may observe in passing that, so far as the public was concerned, there was apparently nothing to distinguish the casual helper, of whom little, if anything, is known, from the regular and trusted servants of the company.

On these bare facts standing alone, it seems to me that there would be evidence upon which the county court judge might reasonably find for the plaintiff, even if it were held that the company was not under the liability of common carriers as regards the lost bag.

But then it was contended with much earnestness that it ought to have been inferred from the circumstances of the case, and from Mrs. Bunch's conduct, that at the time of the loss the bag was not in the custody of the company for the purpose of the journey. It was said that Mrs. Bunch came to the station too soon; that she came before the train was drawn up; that she broke the journey, if the journey is to be taken as having begun, and left the bag in charge of a porter, who was then not acting as the servant of the company within the scope of his authority as such, but acting as her agent in his individual capacity; and that if this was not what she meant, it was an attempt on her part to saddle the company with a liability which they were not bound to undertake.

It seems to me that there is no substance in any of these objections. Mrs. Bunch, no doubt, came to the station somewhat early. But the one thing railway companies try to impress on the public is to come in good time; and considering the crowd likely to be attracted by cheap fares during the Christmas holidays, and the special bustle and throng on Christmas Eve, it does not seem to me that Mrs. Bunch came so unreasonably early as to relieve the company who received the luggage from the ordinary obligations flowing from that receipt. It is impossible to define within the extreme limits on both sides the proper time for arrival. Everything must depend upon the circumstances of the particular case. But among those circumstances the least important, as it seems to me, is the time when the train is drawn up at the departure platform. That is, as everybody knows, a very variable time, and a matter over which the passenger has no control, and of which he can have no notice before he comes to the station.

Then I think there is nothing in the conversation which took place between Mrs. Bunch and the porter. Mrs. Bunch's question was a very natural one. The answer she received was just what might have been expected. Nine women out of ten parting with a travelling bag on which they set any store would ask the same question, and in ninety-nine times out of a hundred the same answer would be returned. I do not think that this conversation altered the relation between the parties in the least degree. It seems to me almost absurd to treat it as a solemn negotiation by which the lady abdicated such rights as she possessed against the Great Western Railway Co., and constituted this ephemeral and evanescent porter in his individual capacity the sole custodian of her Gladstone bag.

Nor can it, I think, be said that Mrs. Bunch broke the journey by leaving the platform to meet her husband and get her ticket. To take a ticket is a necessary incident of a railway journey. It is, at least, a very common incident in railway travelling for persons who intend to travel in company, whether they be members of the same family or not, to meet by appointment in the railway station from which they mean to start, and it is certainly not unusual in such a case for the purchase of tickets to be deferred until the meeting takes place.

It may be that a passenger who has delivered his luggage to a porter at the entrance of the station, though the delivery is in proper time for the intended journey, is not entitled as of right and under all circumstances to consider the company responsible for the safe keeping of his luggage before it is put into the train. A passenger knows that he is not the only person to be attended to, and it might not be unreasonable to hold that there is an implied agreement on his part that he will be ready to resume possession of his luggage if the exigencies of the traffic require that it should be handed back to him in the interval before the time comes to put it into the train. No such question, however, arises here. The lost bag was not left unguarded owing to the exigencies of traffic, or neglected by the porter who took it in consequence of the pressure of conflicting duties. But I desire to say that, for my part, I am not satisfied that a passenger's luggage which has been received by the company's servants, and taken to the platform, lies there at the risk of the passenger, if he is not ready forthwith, or the moment he has got his ticket, to step into the train.

It was said that if everybody acted as Mrs. Bunch acted in this case, railway companies would require an army of porters, and that it would be almost impossible for them to carry on their business. I quite agree; but I am not much impressed by that observation. I apprehend that if all travellers acted precisely alike, if everybody arrived at a station for a particular journey at precisely the same moment, though the time of arrival were the fittest that could be imagined, there would be no little confusion, and perhaps some consternation, among the railway officials. Whatever may be the result of your lordships' judgment, there is no fear that it will have the effect of making everybody act alike. Some passengers will still give more trouble at the stations than others, but no one will give any more trouble for it. Things will go on just as usual. The fidgetty and the nervous will still come too soon; the unready and the unpunctual will still put off their chance of arrival till the last moment, and the prudent may have their calculations upset by the many accidents and hindrances that may be met with on the way to the station. And it is just because of the irregularity of individuals that the stream of traffic is regular and easily managed.

In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that the majority of the Court of Appeal were right in the view they took. The nature of the case requires that a broad view should be taken. The contract between the company and the passenger is not a contract in writing, defining with mathematical accuracy the precise limits of the incidental services which the company are prepared to render, and punishing every transgression, every attempt on the part of the passenger to exact more than his just measure of attention, with the loss of that security which belongs to a contract by common carriers. Railway companies do their best to adapt the conduct of their business to the habits of the travelling public, who resent nothing so much as petty and vexatious restrictions and regulations; and so the contract becomes moulded in matters incidental to its main purpose by that which is, and is known to be, the ordinary and every-day practice of railway companies. A narrow, technical, and jealous view of the rights of individual passengers might, perhaps, enable railway companies to escape liability in some few cases; I much doubt whether it would tend to their advantage in the long run.

Bankruptcy. June 8, 24.

Ex parte Kennedy.
In re F. W. Willis. (a.)

Mortgage—Attornment clause—Bankruptcy petition—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 6.

An indenture of mortgage contained a clause whereby the mortgagor attorned and became tenant from quarter to quarter to the mortgagee in respect of the premises at a yearly rent, by equal quarterly payments of £2,000. The consideration for the mortgage was an advance of £20,000, on which interest at £5 per cent. per annum was to be made payable. By the terms of the mortgage deed the first payment of the above rent was to be made on the first day of the month next after any interest thereby secured should have become in arrear, but all money received by the mortgagee for rent due under the attornment was to be accepted in the first place in or towards satisfaction of the interest then in arrear. A bankruptcy petition was subsequently presented against the mortgagor, upon which he was adjudicated bankrupt, but between such petition and adjudication the mortgagee distrained under the tenancy created by the attornment, and realized the sum of £1,715. The mortgage was not registered as a bill of sale.

Held (Lord Esher, M.R., dubitante), that the attornment clause in question fell within the first part of section 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and not within the proviso of that section, which is limited to cases where possession by the mortgagee precedes the demise; that, the mortgage not being registered, the distress was therefore unlawful; and that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to the money realized.

Decision of Cave, J. (ante, p. 639), affirmed.

Appeal from an order of Cave, J., sitting in bankruptcy, setting aside a distress under a mortgage.

By deed dated the 28th of January, 1884, F. W Willis demised, by way of mortgage to Lady Willoughby D'Eresby, the premises known as "Willis's Rooms" for the residue of a term of years created by certain indentures, to secure the repayment of £20,000 then advanced by her to him. The interest was payable half-yearly at the rate of £5 per cent. By the same deed Willis attorned as tenant to Lady Willoughby of the same premises from quarter to quarter at the yearly rent of £2,000, payable by equal quarterly payments, the first payment to become due the first day after the interest secured became in arrear; and all money received by Lady Willoughby as rent due under the attornment was to be accepted in satisfaction of interest. On September 25, 1885, a bankruptcy petition was presented against Willis. On November 7 Lady Willoughby distrained, under the attornment clause, for the amount of interest in arrear, and the distress realized £1,715 17s. On the 20th of November following a receiving order was made against Willis, and adjudication followed, upon which Kennedy was appointed trustee. The trustee sought to claim the produce of the distress on the ground that the attornment under which the distraint was exercised was a bill of sale under section 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and was void as being unregistered. Upon the hearing before Cave, J., judgment was given for the trustee (ante, p. 639). The mortgagee now appealed.

French, Q.C., and Lane, for the appellant, the mortgagee.—This instrument comes within the exemption proviso of section 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, being

"a demise at a fair and reasonable rent." The tenancy was quarterly, as distinct from the payment of the interest on the advance, which was half-yearly. The validity of the rent is the criterion whether the attornment effects an actual demise or is only for the security of any advance: Ex parte Williams, 26 W. R. 274, 7 Ch. D. 138; In re Stockton Iron Furnace Co., 27 W. R. 433, 10 Ch. D. 335; Ex parte Jackson, 29 W. R. 253, 14 Ch. D. 725; Hall v. Comfort, 35 W. R. 48, 18 Q. B. D. 11; Batchelor v. Yates, ante, p. 563, 38 Ch. D. 112.

Cooper-Willis, Q.C., and Houghton, for the respondent, the trustee.—All the cases cited apply to instruments executed prior to the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. Section 6 aims at all mortgages where the mortgagee is not in possession. This instrument was not a real lease for any definite period. Under the proviso possession by the mortgagee is the condition precedent of the instruments exempted. The section intended to do away with attornments unless they were registered as bills of sale.

French, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 24.—LINDLEY, L.J.—The question for us to decide in this case is whether the mortgagee or the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to £1,715, the produce of the sale of certain chattels on which the mortgagee distrained by virtue of an attornment clause in a mortgage deed dated the 28th of January, 1884. The premises were leasehold, and were the well-known "Willis's Rooms." The mortgage was for an advance of £20,000. It contained provisions for the payment of interest on that sum, and, in default, for a power of sale by the mortgagee and a power to enter. Then there was an attornment clause under which the mortgagor attorned and became, in effect, tenant to the mortgagee at a yearly rent of £2,000 by equal quarterly payments, and the money to be received in rent was to be accepted in the first place in satisfaction of the interest due on the money advanced. There was, farther, a proviso that the attornment clause was not to render it compulsory upon the mortgagee to collect the rent or become accountable for it to any subsequent mortgagee or incumbrancer. This proviso was, doubtless, put in to remove any doubt which might be held to render the mortgagee liable to account for the rent received under the attornment clause. It protects him from the equitable doctrine by which a mortgagee in possession can be called upon to account for the rent received by way of interest on the mortgage. I do not think that this proviso really affects the question before us. There is no question that the clause constitutes the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties, as has been decided in cases recently discussed. The question is, What is the effect of such relationship? That depends, not only upon the mortgage deed, but upon the Bills of Sale Act. The material portion of that Act on this point is section 6 of the Act of 1878, with the proviso expressly added in reference to attornment clauses. That proviso is not applicable to ordinary leases, nor does any section of any Bills of Sale Act apply to leases with the ordinary power of distress. In Hall v. Comfort that was practically the ground of the decision. The Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 6, only applies to attornments given by way of security for money advanced. The section enacts that "Every attornment . . . whereby a power of distress is given or agreed to be given by any person to any other person by way of security for any present, future, or contingent debt or advance, and whereby any rent is reserved or made payable as a mode of providing for the payment of interest on such debt or advance, or otherwise for the purpose of such security only, shall be deemed to be a bill of sale. . . ." I will pause there to point out the effect of the enactment so far.

In Hall v. Comfort it was said that the clause does not apply to attornment in mortgages unless followed by express powers of distraint. But, if so, every attornment would be struck at as well as other instruments whereby powers of distress are given by way of security, because attornment carries with it an implied power of distress. But I think that whoever drew this section was aware that there were two forms of mortgage, one by which an express power is given to enter and distrain, and the other by attornment; the former of which is not so beneficial in the matter of distress as the latter, by which the power is incidental to the relationship created. For under the express power the mortgagee can only seize the tenant's own goods, while under the attornment clause any goods upon the premises may be seized. Consequently, an attornment clause has taken the place, to a great extent, of the other form. This section, however, must be taken to affect both classes of mortgages if they are given by way of securing interest upon an advance of money. If it is an instrument whereby a power of distress is given by way of security for any advance, that instrument is a bill of sale within the Act of Parliament, and it was admitted by the appellant that, so far as this clause by itself goes, and were it to stop there, we must hold that the attornment before us was such an instrument, and constituted a bill of sale. But the clause goes on to a proviso enacting that "nothing in this section shall extend to any mortgage of any estate or interest in any land, tenement . . . which the mortgagee, being in possession, shall have demised to the mortgagor as his tenant at a fair and reasonable rent." It is very difficult to give effect to all the words in this section as coupled with this proviso. The proviso does not say that nothing applicable in the Act to attornments shall affect any mortgage. How could it affect a mortgage at all unless it is one accompanied by an attornment or other clause affected by the first part of the section? Then is this second part of the section, this proviso, intended to protect attornments at a valid rent which are not, however, preceded by possession by the mortgagee?

If it was intended to confine the clause to cases where the mortgagee was in possession, I do not think the clause is very clearly drawn. At any rate, no construction will give full effect to the words "mortgage" and "mortgagee being in possession." Still, I cannot think the proviso was intended to protect a deed which in effect amounts to a loan on a mortgage of chattels without possession by the mortgagee. The expression "mortgagee being in possession" must be intended for some purpose, and gives the key to the meaning of the proviso. The true construction would seem to me to be that the proviso applies to that state of things where possession by the mortgagee precedes the demise, that such demises only are intended to be protected by this proviso. If all attornments are held to be included in the first part of the section, then the proviso is given effect to by this construction, since it proceeds to withdraw from the first part of the section attornments by way of mortgage where possession by the mortgagee precedes the demise by attornment. The general purport of bills of sale legislation is to enforce the registration, as securities, of instruments for money lending. There is nothing to warrant the conclusion that the Legislature intended to deprive landholders of their common law right to distrain, but contemplated solely the lending of money on the security of chattels. All such instruments as effected this must to be subject to registration. It must be taken that the Legislature intended to extend the scope of the Acts to attornments made by way of mortgages, but to exempt demises by a mortgagee in possession. Upon this construction which I think is the true one of this section and proviso, it is impossible to bring within the proviso as exempted from the first part of the section any attornment executed at a fair and valid rent. To claim such exemption the facts must show a mortgagee in possession followed by a demise. That was pretended to be the case here. I think Cave, J., was right in holding this instrument to be a bill of sale within the section, and this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree with the judgment of my brother Lindley, and the reasoning of my brother Cave in the court below. Had the first part of the section been left to stand alone there would be, it is admitted, nothing to exempt this attornment from its effect. But there follows the proviso exempting certain instruments in cases where the mortgagee is in possession. These words must be given effect to. They must be taken to refer to actual possession and a subsequent demise by the mortgagee. I believe the Legislature intended to limit the exemptions to such cases only, while they sought to invalidate mere attornment clauses in the mortgage of chattels so far as they conveyed powers of distraint. I think the present instrument does not come within the proviso.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I do not propose to disagree with the judgments delivered. I will only say that I had my doubts, and after listening to the exceedingly able judgment of my brother Lindley those doubts are not removed, but intensified.

HOLMES v. BRIERLEY. (a.)

Infant—Promise to marry—Evidence of new promise—Ratification—Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62), s. 2.

The defendant, while he was under age, promised to marry the plaintiff. After he came of age the plaintiff told him that her father's pecuniary circumstances were altered, and offered to release him from his engagement. The defendant was much hurt at this, and said he was ready to marry her then if she thought they were old enough. The plaintiff replied that she thought they had better wait till they were older. Subsequently the defendant refused to carry out the engagement.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 693), that there was evidence on which the jury might find that there had been a new promise by the defendant after he came of age.

Appeal from a decision of a divisional court (Huddleston, B., and Charles, J.) setting aside a verdict for the plaintiff and giving judgment for the defendant (ante, p. 693).

The action was for breach of promise of marriage. The defendant pleaded infancy. The facts are sufficiently set out in the judgment of Huddleston, B. The question was whether there was evidence of a new promise after the defendant came of age, or whether what was said and done between the parties only amounted to a ratification of the original promise. The Divisional Court held that there was no evidence of a new promise, but only evidence of a ratification of the old promise.

The plaintiff appealed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In a case like this I am of opinion that the right question for the jury, if there is evidence in support of it, is the question stated by Lopes, L.J., in Northcote v. Doughty, 4 C. P. D. 385, 28 W. R. Dig. 106—viz., did the defendant intend to make a new absolute promise or merely to re-affirm the old promise? And that substantially was the question which the learned judge put to the jury in the present case. The question remains, was there evidence on which a jury might reasonably find that a new promise was made and accepted? I decline to lay down a rule for all cases. But in this case I think the jury were entitled to come to the conclusion that the plaintiff released the defendant from his engagement, and that he understood that he was free, and that he then made a fresh proposal of marriage, which she accepted. Therefore judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for the amount of the verdict. I wish to add that the only question of law decided in Ditcham v. Worrall, 29 W. R. 59, 5 C. P. D. 410, was that there was evidence to go to the jury.

GRAND JUNCTION CANAL CO. v. PETTY AND OTHERS. (a.)

Highway—Dedication—Power of canal company to dedicate tow-path to public.

A canal company has power to dedicate to the public as a highway land which has been acquired by it as a tow-path under statutory powers, if the user by the public would not be incompatible with the purposes for which the land was acquired.

R. v. Inhabitants of Leake, 5 B. & Ad. 469, approved.

Motion by the plaintiffs for new trial on the ground of misdirection.

Action to recover damages for trespass, for breaking and entering upon the plaintiff's towing-path, and for breaking open and destroying a gate and wall belonging to them there situate, for an injunction and a declaration that no public right of way existed along the said towing-path.

The towing-path in question is on a branch of the Grand Junction Canal, which terminates in a basin at Aylesbury. A wall runs across this basin with a gate leading from the public high road on to the towing-path. There was abundant evidence to show that for a period extending over nearly fifty years, and until quite recently, the public had been accustomed, with occasional interruptions, to enter and leave the towing-path by this gate, and to walk along the towing-path and use it, with perfect freedom, as a public footway. Occasionally, however, it appeared that persons found fishing on the path had been stopped, and within the last two or three years various notices, such as "No Thoroughfare," "For Canal Purposes only," &c., had been posted up.

The defendants were three labourers who, in assertion of an alleged right of way along the path, had broken down the gate, which had recently been locked. At the trial, which took place at Aylesbury before Pollock, B., and a jury, the learned judge left it as a question for the jury whether there had been such a user as showed a dedication of the towing-path by the plaintiffs to the public.

A verdict was found and judgment entered for the defendants.

Graham and Etherington Smith, for the applicants.—The learned judge was wrong in not directing the jury that there could not be a dedication to the public without an intention to dedicate. The evidence as to the notices posted up by the company must be held to be conclusive that no such intention existed. Under the Grand Junction Canal Act the dedication of the towing-path was ultrà vires, and the judge should have so ruled. The company cannot dedicate their land for any other purposes than those for which they took it under their Act: Bostock v. The Staffordshire Railway Co., 4 E. & B. 798, 3 W. R. Dig. 151; Mulliner v. Midland Railway Co., 27 W. R. 330, 11 Ch. D. 611.

Winch, Q.C., and Hammond-Chambers, for the respondents.—The question as to evidence of dedication was properly left to the jury. The company can dedicate a right of way to the public where such right of way is not inconsistent with the purposes for which they took the land under their Act of Parliament: The Grand Surrey Canal Co. v. Hall, 1 M. & G. 392; R. v. Inhabitants of Leake, 5 B. & Ad. 469. There is nothing inconsistent between the use of the path by the public for walking on and its use for the purposes of the canal.

Graham replied.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the direction of the learned judge was correct, and that this application must be refused. There is a large, and in one sense overwhelming, body of evidence to prove that, down to a time comparatively recent, there had practically been a perfectly free user of the towing-path by persons accustomed to walk along it. It was urged on the part of the canal company that the path had never actually been dedicated to the public. They contend that this is conclusively proved by the fact that they had for some time posted up notices which indicated that they did not intend it to be so dedicated, and therefore no amount of user would be evidence on which the jury could find that there had been a dedication. No doubt dedication is a question of intention, and if it could be shown that there was no intention to dedicate, there could have been no dedication, but I do not think that the evidence of intention in this case must necessarily be taken as conclusive. All that was done on the part of the company was to put up certain notices and occasionally stop persons—for the most part either mischievous boys or persons who engaged in fishing (a right to which did not necessarily follow from a right of way). The learned judge was not bound to direct the jury that this was conclusive evidence against an intention to dedicate, and he was right in leaving it to them to consider whether the negative evidence against the intention overbore the positive evidence of dedication.

It is also contended that, the company having acquired the land only for the purposes of the canal, were not entitled to apply it to, or allow it to be used for, any other purpose. That is no doubt true when, as in Bostock v. The Staffordshire Railway Co. and Mulliner v. Midland Railway Co., the purpose for which the land is used is inconsistent with the purpose for which it was acquired or for which the company was established. On the other hand, however, the cases of Grand Surrey Canal Co. v. Hall and R. v. Inhabitants of Leake lay down the principle very clearly that where land is vested in a company under an Act of Parliament it may be dedicated to the use of the public as a highway, provided that such use is not inconsistent with the purposes for which the land was originally vested under such Act. There is nothing inconsistent between the use of the towing-path by the public for the purpose of walking on it and its use by the company for canal purposes. The application therefore fails on both grounds.

MATHEW, J., concurred.

The plaintiffs appealed.

June 26.—Graham and Etherington Smith, for the appellants.

Hammond Chambers, for the respondents.

The arguments used were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a question of dedication is raised. There is no doubt as to the law relating to the dedication of a right of way. The dedication must be intentional, and it must be accepted by the public. Those are questions of evidence, and if there is evidence from which a jury can infer that there has been an intentional dedication on the one side and an acceptance of such dedication by the public on the other, the verdict cannot be disturbed. Now in this case the jury have found that there was such a dedication and acceptance, and there was sufficient evidence from which they might draw such an inference. But it is contended that, even assuming that the finding of the jury was correct, there could not have been a dedication, because the canal company are a statutory body, and have no power to dedicate any part of their statutory property to the public. That is a question of law, and in my opinion the cases on the point are not really inconsistent. In R. v. Inhabitants of Leake, at p. 478, Parke, J., says this: "If the land were vested by the Act of Parliament in commissioners so that they were thereby bound to use it for some special purpose incompatible with its public use as a highway, I should have thought that such trustees would have been incapable, in point of law, to make a dedication of it, but if such use by the public be not incompatible with the objects prescribed by the Act, then I think it clear that the commissioners have that power." That appears to me to be the correct principle of decision, and I adopt it.

It has been contended that, even though the user by the public be not inconsistent with the objects for which the land is statutorily taken and the purposes for which the company was formed, yet the company have no power to dedicate to the public. I do not agree with this contention. It has not been suggested that the right of the public to walk along the tow-path would be incompatible with the purposes of the canal company. I think, therefore, the case falls within the ruling of Parke, J. A different case may arise some day where the user by the public would be inconsistent with the objects of the company, but in this case there is nothing inconsistent with those objects. That being so, the dedication would not have been illegal. I cannot suppose that the dedication was absolutely without any restriction. It is a limited dedication. The public are so to use the two-path as not to interfere with the ordinary use of the tow-path by the company and those using the canal. The public must be taken to have accepted the dedication as a limited dedication, and they would, in my opinion, have no right to interfere with or obstruct the persons properly using the canal and the tow-path for the purposes for which the canal and the tow-path were formed. I am therefore of opinion that this case is governed by the decision in R. v. Inhabitants of Leake, and I think this appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The only difficulty in the case is as to the question of law. It is said that the canal company were incapable of dedicating this tow-path to the public. Is that proposition maintainable? There is no evidence that the use of the tow-path by the public is in any way incompatible or inconsistent with its use by the canal company for the purposes for which that company was formed. If that point had been raised it would have been a question for the jury, and on their finding a different state of things would have arisen. It has been urged that the case of Mulliner v. Midland Railway Co. is inconsistent with R. v. Inhabitants of Leake. But I think that the former case is not in point. There the existence of the right of way was plainly inconsistent with the objects of the company, and the case is therefore distinguishable from R. v. Inhabitants of Leake. In my opinion the principle laid down in that case by Parke, J., was the correct one, and since there is no incompatibility here, I think the company had power to dedicate, and that this appeal fails.

LOPES, L.J.—Can a right of way be acquired against a corporation who has acquired land for certain specific purposes? I think such a corporation has power to dedicate to a limited extent—that is to say, to the extent that they may confer upon the public such a right of way as is not inconsistent with the purposes for which they have compulsorily taken the land so dedicated. Here there is absolutely no evidence that the user of the land by the public would be in any way inconsistent with the purposes of the canal company. That point was never taken. The result is, in my opinion, that the company had power to dedicate this tow-path, and the jury, having found that they did, in fact, dedicate it, I think the verdict and judgment must stand.

Contempt—Committal — Jurisdiction of superior court to review—Powers of county court judge to commit—Form of warrant—County Courts Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 113.

The jurisdiction of the superior court, in reviewing committals for contempt by an inferior court, is limited to the consideration whether there were materials upon which the judge ordering the committal could have reasonably inferred contempt, and whether the form of committal is in accordance with one or other of the forms laid down in section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1846.

Quære, whether a committal for contempt is not a criminal matter on which no appeal from the Queen's Bench should have been heard.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ., ante, p. 589), affirmed.

Appeal from the Divisional Court's (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.) refusal to quash an order of committal.

The facts of this case will be found fully set out in the report of the application to the Divisional Court (ante, p. 589). His Honour Judge Jordan had committed the appellant, Turner, a solicitor, for contempt of court for interrupting him, in the course of his giving judgment against an application of Turner for a new trial, with the words "That is a most unjust remark," in reference to certain statements made by the judge which Turner considered to be reflections on his personal character. It was argued for the appellant (1) that the words did not amount to a "wilful insult" to the judge so as to give him jurisdiction to commit, and (2) that the writ merely committed Turner to prison without the option of a fine which the judge had, at first, orally imposed. The facts showed that the judge had, upon the occasion of the contempt alleged to have been committed, said, "I shall fine you £5 or commit you for six days," and the entry upon the judge's note-book was "£5 or 6 days." The appellant was detained till the rising of the court, and upon his declining to withdraw the remark the judge ordered the warrant for his committal to be drawn out, without reference to the before-mentioned fine of £5 or any option.

Willis, Q.C., Vaughan Williams, and Carrington, for the appellant, cited In re Pollard, L. R. 2 P. C. 106, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4; Ex parte Pater, 12 W. R. 823, 5 B. & S. 299.

Henn-Collins, Q.C., and C. Russell, for the respondent, cited In re Crawford, 13 Q. B. 613.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an application to quash an order of committal, and also to quash the writ under which the committal was executed. The warrant is signed by the judge of the Newcastle-under-Lyme County Court and sealed with his seal, and is dated the 18th of January, 1888. It duly recites the fact and date of the committal of the appellant, and by whose authority and commands the gaoler "do take the said Turner to prison and safely to keep him there for six days from this day or until he shall be sooner discharged in due course of law." The appellant was so arrested and imprisoned until released on an earlier day by a second order from the judge to the effect that he, the judge, "being satisfied that Turner has sufficiently discharged his contempt, do order him to be discharged forthwith." [The Lord Justice here recited the facts of the case as given before, and continued:—] We have not to say here whether there was or was not a contempt in fact committed. The only jurisdiction we have in reviewing the discretion of a judge in exercising his power is limited to the question whether there were before the judge any materials from which he could reasonably infer that a contempt was committed. It is no part of the duty of this court to decide upon the exercise of the discretion of the court below, except as to the question whether the particular order was a valid one. Ought this order of committal to be quashed as invalid or not? The only power of a county court judge to commit for contempt is conveyed by section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1846. By that section, where a wilful insult has been committed, &c., "the judge shall be empowered (inter alia), if he shall think fit, by a warrant under his hand, and sealed with the seal of the court, to commit any such offender to any prison" to which he has power to commit prisoners under the Act, "for any time not exceeding seven days, or to impose upon any such offender a fine not exceeding £5 for every such offence, and in default of payment thereof to commit the offender to any such prison as aforesaid for any time not exceeding seven days, unless the said fine be sooner paid." Now this section is only important here as showing the different forms of committal. So long as there are materials shown from which the judge below could draw a reasonable inference of contempt, we have only to consider the form of committal.

From the admitted report of the proceedings it appears that upon the alleged contempt taking place the judge said, "I shall impose a fine of £5 or committal for six days," and an entry is made by him on his book of

"Fine of £5 or six days." Later on there is a further discussion between the judge and Turner, when the judge held that Turner declined to apologize. It is impossible for judges not present on the occasion to realize all that took place. A vast deal depends on the manner, tone, circumstances, &c. The fact remains that the judge held that Turner did not apologize, and the judge thereupon ordered a warrant of committal to be made out. The only question of law on this first point is, Whether there were proper materials from which the judge could draw an inference that a contempt was committed? There clearly were such materials. But it is said on the second point that the warrant is wrong in form, because upon the first committal of the offense the judge imposed a fine, and only imprisonment in default, whereas the warrant in the final form only orders imprisonment. But it is clear that the judge finally ordered the warrant to be made out for committal for six days without referring to the fine. He might change his mind as to that. All that we have to go by is the authorized form under the statute. It is clear that no steps were taken to enforce the fine. No warrant was signed and sealed as required by the section. No way can be suggested in which that fine could be levied. The mere entry of the note in the judge's book is of no effect. We must go by the warrant, which is finally signed by him under his hand and sealed with the seal of his court. This warrant only recites a committal for six days. And such a committal he was authorized to make under the section. In point of law no fine was imposed. It amounts to a mere expression of his intention. When he came to exercise his power under the statute he imposed imprisonment without the option of a fine. The Divisional Court, after considering the point, held that the form of warrant applied to either imprisonment absolutely or imprisonment with the option of a fine and in default of its payment. That may be so, but I do not think it necessary for our decision to consider that point. It is sufficient for us to say that the only form of committal before us is one authorized and imposed by the law, and is the only form in which the judge, whatever his intention, has exercised the power committed to him. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—The incident on which this appeal is founded is no doubt regrettable, and one which might perhaps have been avoided by less hastiness on either side. We have only to consider whether the power undoubtedly intrusted to a judge, but one which I have, fortunately, never found myself called upon to exercise, has been lawfully exercised. It is certainly a valuable power, but one to be cautiously and temperately exercised. There are two questions for us to decide. (1) Whether or not there was any reasonable ground on which the judge could come to the conclusion, as he did, that a contempt was committed? The jurisdiction of the superior court in matters of contempt is plainly put by Blackburn, L.J., in Ex parte Pater in words upon which I cannot improve: "This court has power to set right inferior courts if they act beyond their jurisdiction. But if the inferior court had before them reasonable evidence from which they could draw the conclusion that the facts which gave them jurisdiction existed, and they drew that conclusion, we cannot say that we do not draw the same conclusion, and reverse their judgment. I agree that in considering a question of contempt we must see whether the inferior court had reasonable grounds for adjudging that a contempt had been committed, but we must bear in mind that the court is the judge whether it has been treated with contempt:"

Applying the words to the present case, we have to consider whether the expressions used and uttered by one who, as a solicitor, was bound to consider himself an officer of the court, were words capable in law of being held to amount to contempt? It is impossible to say that they were not capable of being so held. If so, the fact of there being any contempt committed is one for the judge alone to decide. He has to draw the inference on reasonable materials of a contempt being intended, and as this court is bound to hold that such words were capable of conveying contempt, we must revise the conclusion to which the judge who had them and witnessed all the circumstances of their come. The second and only other question is, Whether the warrant was defective in form? It is necessary, in order to decide upon this, to refer to section 118 of the County Courts Act, 1846. There are three courses left open by that section to the judge. He may either detain the offender until the rising of the court, or he may issue a warrant for his committal, or he may by warrant impose a fine, and only commit pending the non-payment of such fine. In both the latter cases he must exercise his power by a warrant signed and sealed. The warrant here is certainly one for the absolute committal of the appellant. It is said to be bad because the judge directed earlier in the day that a fine of £5, or committal for six days, should be imposed. But what finally happened? The county court judge may have thought at first that a fine or imprisonment in default was the proper course, but he issued no warrant to that effect. The entry in his book, or on the minutes of the court-book, would be quite inoperative to carry out his intention. He was quite free to review his decision if he thought fit. No fine could have been recovered upon the authority of such entry. It appears that later on the judge was inclined to mitigate his view of the case if Turner had thought fit to apologize, but Turner, for good or bad reasons, it is not for us to say, persisted in his view of the impossibility of his withdrawing the expression. Then this warrant issue. It is one authorized by the Act, and cannot, therefore, be quashed on any plea of irregularity. I entirely agree with my brother Lindley's judgment, and with the result of the judgment in the court below.

Swain v. Ayres. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Agreement for lease—Breach of covenant to repair—Forfeiture—Notice—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14.

The notice required by section 14 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, is only requisite where there is an actual existing lease or where there is an agreement for a lease of which the court will grant specific performance.

Appeal from the decision of Charles, J. (reported 20 Q. B. D. 585).

The action was brought to recover possession of a house and premises in High-road, Lee, in the county of Kent, and for mesne profits.

It appeared that, by an agreement dated July 25, 1853, E. Larwell, for himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, agreed to let the premises in question to H. G. Mortimer, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from June 24, 1853, for a term of eighty years at a specified annual rent, and Mortimer agreed to accept a lease of the premises. The agreement further provided that the lease should contain all usual covenants, and particularly covenants to pay rent and to keep the property in good repair, and that, on the breach of any of the covenants by Mortimer, Larwell should be at liberty to re-enter and take possession.

The plaintiff was the assignee of the reversion expectant upon the determination of the term of eighty years, and the defendant was the assignee of Mortimer's interest.

In 1887, when the writ was issued, a year's rent was due in respect of the premises, and the premises had not been kept in repair in accordance with the terms of the agreement.

The defendant contended that he was entitled to notice, which it was admitted had not been given before action, under section 14 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881.

The section provides that: "A right of re-entry or forfeiture under any proviso or stipulation in a lease for a breach of any covenant or condition in the lease shall not be enforceable by action or otherwise unless and until the lessor serve on the lessee a notice specifying the particular breach complained of; and, if the breach is capable of remedy, requiring the lessee to remedy the breach."

Charles, J., held that the agreement did not constitute a lease within the meaning of the section, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Cavanagh and Moyses, for the appellant. — The defendant has paid rent for many years. He is therefore tenant from year to year. A tenancy from year to year has always been regarded as a lease: Shepherd's Touchstone, vol. 1, p. 266. There was here an agreement for a lease and a subsequent payment of rent. That is in itself sufficient to constitute a lease: Bennett v. Ireland, E. B. & E. 334, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 47; Coatsworth v. Johnson, 55 L. J. Q. B. 220, 34 W. R. Dig. 94. This would be good as a lease in equity: Hill v. Barclay, 16 Ves. 403; Walsh v. Lonsdale, 31 W. R. 109, 21 Ch. D. 9. There were special circumstances in this case which would have induced a court of equity to grant specific performance of the agreement even although there had been a breach of the covenant to repair. Finally, the reason that a court of equity would not grant specific performance of an agreement for a lease where there had been a breach of covenant was because it would do nothing in vain, and the lease would be liable to be immediately set aside by the entry of the lessor; but since the Conveyancing Act the lessor cannot enter for breach of covenant without giving the notice prescribed by section 14. Therefore the courts will now grant specific performance of an agreement for a lease even when there has been a breach of covenant.

They also referred to Doe d. Rigg v. Bell, 5 T. R. 471; Clayton v. Blakey, 8 T. R. 3; In re Maughan, 33 W. R. 308, 14 Q. B. D. 956; Gourlay v. Duke of Somerset, 1 Ves. & B. 68.

Pinlay, Q.C., and Lush Wilson, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the defendant was, in my opinion, tenant to the plaintiff. He was a tenant upon the terms of the agreement for a lease so far as they were applicable to such a tenancy, and therefore he held upon the terms that he would keep the premises in repair, and that if he did not do so the landlord might re-enter. If he was a tenant his landlord had at law a right to re-enter and to eject him if he refused to go when he had broken the covenants. That was the case prior to the Conveyancing Act, 1881. Now, is this tenant entitled to the protection of section 14 of that Act? That depends upon whether he is in such a position as to come within the terms of the section. It says: "A right of re-entry or forfeiture under any proviso or stipulation in a lease for a breach of any covenant or condition in the lease shall not be enforceable by action or otherwise unless and until the lessor serve on the lessee a notice specifying the particular breach complained of, and, if the breach is capable of remedy, requiring the lessee to remedy the breach." That is the protection which the defendant claims to have. The words are "in a lease." Now, has the defendant a lease? Primâ facie the section applies to the case of an existing lease, and it is clear that there is no lease in existence here in the ordinary signification of the term. The section, primâ facie, does not apply to a mere case of tenancy, if such can exist without a lease. But it is said that the word "lease" comprises an agreement for a lease even before entry or payment of any rent. I think that contention is contrary to the ordinary meaning of language. Charles, J., has held that the word "lease" does not comprise in this section such an agreement for a lease as this; and he fortifies that opinion by pointing out that in this very Act, when the Legislature desire, in section 18, to include agreements for leases, it expressly mentions them. I think that fortification was quite right, but I think it was unnecessary. It has been urged that those two sections of the Act have a different scope. That may be so; but that is not the point. I think that the word "lease" does not include an agreement for a lease merely because such an agreement exists.

Now does the word "lease" apply to anything more than an actual tangible existing lease? I think it applies to what is in law equivalent to a tangible lease.

The distinction between law and equity has now been abolished, and the court can enforce either. Therefore, where a court of equity would formerly have decreed specific performance of an agreement for a lease, that agreement will be held in both divisions to be equivalent to a lease and will be treated as though it were the actual lease.

Now in this case, as I have said, the defendant had a tenancy by reason of his being in possession and having paid rent to the landlord. He held that tenancy upon so many of the terms of the agreement for a lease as were applicable to a tenancy from year to year. According to the view expressed by Sir George Jessel in Walsh v. Lonsdale, if the court of equity would have granted specific performance of the agreement, he would hold upon the terms which would be introduced into the lease according to the agreement. It was rightly stated in Bennett v. Ireland that the holding would at common law have been on such of the terms of the agreement as would be applicable to a tenancy from year to year. If, however, the court would not give specific performance, then he would have only a tenancy and not a lease, and that in itself would not entitle him to the protection given by section 14. Therefore, unless the defendant here is in such a position that he could obtain specific performance of the agreement for a lease, he is not entitled to the protection of the section. Could he have obtained specific performance? It is contended that he could. It is clear that the court would not treat an agreement as an existing lease if they would not grant specific performance of it. It is also clear that the court of equity would not grant specific performance of an agreement for a lease where there had been a breach of the covenant to repair. But it is said that the Conveyancing Act has altered the principle on which the court used to act. It is said that the court would grant specific performance of the agreement for a lease now because section 14 would apply and would give the tenant at once a locus pœnitentiæ. But before section 14 can apply there must be a lease or something equivalent to a lease, and it is a contradiction to say that the court will consider this as equivalent to a lease because section 14 applies.

Then it was urged that under the particular circumstances of this case the court would grant specific performance of the agreement, although there had been a breach of covenant. Unless there were other special circumstances it is clear that the court would not have granted specific performance. If there were any such special circumstances, such as surprise, or some other excuse, they were neither pleaded, nor were they brought forward at the trial. It is impossible to allow them to be brought forward now, and we must treat the case as if no such special circumstances existed. Therefore I think that the court would not grant specific performance of this agreement, that there is no lease in existence, and that the case does not fall within section 14, but that it is a mere tenancy, and not a lease. This decision may be a step further than we went in Coatsworth v. Johnson but I think the judgment there clearly shows that we were prepared to go so far.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The only question raised at the trial was whether or not the defendant was entitled to the protection of section 14. That was the sole point, and upon that point I think the decision of Charles, J., was correct. I think it would be wrong, looking at the language of the section, to hold that an agreement for a lease was the same as a lease. It is unnecessary now to say for what purposes an agreement for a lease and a lease are the same. I do not think this was a lease either at law or equity. It is said that this is a case in which specific performance would be decreed. Primâ facie a breach of covenant to repair is fatal to a decree of specific performance, but there may be special circumstances modifying this. No such circumstances have, however, been pleaded or raised at the trial, and it is too late to go into them now. I think Mr. Cavanagh's suggestion, that the principle on which the courts acted in granting or refusing specific performance of an agreement for a lease has been swept away by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, is most startling. But on being looked into it comes to this—that the court will grant specific performance of an agreement because section 14 applies; but it must be shown that section 14 applies before the court will grant specific performance. Section 14 applies only to leases, or to such agreements for leases, as the court will grant specific performance of. It is, therefore, arguing in a circle. The Act has been in force since 1881, and this is the first time that this contention has been raised. I cannot assent to it. I think it is unsound, and in fairness to the opposite side, if raised, it ought to have been raised on the pleadings. I think that answers the whole point. This is not a lease, and I think, under the circumstances before him, Charles, J., was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The position of the defendant is that he is tenant from year to year under the terms of the agreement for a lease as far as they are applicable. That being so, there is no lease within the meaning of section 14. It is said that the agreement is equivalent to a lease because the court of equity would grant specific performance of it. Even if this were true, which I doubt, I think that, having regard to the pleadings and evidence before the court, it would not grant specific performance. I cannot agree that the Conveyancing Act has altered the practice of the Courts of Chancery. I am clearly of opinion that the case is not within section 14, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Stephen and A. L. Smith, JJ.)

On March 17, 1887, an order was made against the plaintiff at petty sessions at St. Albans, after a hearing by the justices, to pay a certain sum, being part of the costs incurred by the defendants in paving a road adjoining his premises under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875. Counsel for the plaintiff at once informed the justices orally of his intention to apply for a case, which the justices then signified their willingness to grant.

On March 23 the plaintiff's solicitor served the clerk to the justices with an application in writing, addressed to the justices who made the order, requesting them to state a case, but no similar applications were served upon the justices present at the hearing.

The justices stated a case for the decision of the court, but upon the matter coming before the Queen's Bench Division objection was taken that rule 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, had not been complied with. The rule requires that "An application to a court of summary jurisdiction under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, to state a case shall be made in writing and a copy left with the clerk of the court."

The Divisional Court held that they were bound by the decision in South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. v. Stone, 19 Q. B. D. 168, 35 W. R. Dig. 110, and that they had, therefore, no jurisdiction to hear the case.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. P. Grain and Reginald Kemp, for the appellant.—The rules are merely directory. No injustice was done, as the magistrates had been asked, and had agreed, to state a case. The stating of the case cures the defects in applying for it.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Richard Muir, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

Lord EHER, M.R.—The only question in this case is whether the Divisional Court had jurisdiction to entertain this appeal or not. The power to bring such an appeal is given by section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and by that section it is provided that the application for a special case "shall be made in such manner as may be from time to time directed by rules under this Act." The effect of that is to read the rules into the Act. By rule 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, "An application to a court of summary jurisdiction to state a special case shall be made in writing, and a copy left with the clerk of the court." There are a long series of cases beginning with Morgan v. Edwards, 29 L. J. M. C. 108, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 2, which decide that in regard to a statute relating to subject-matter similar to this, with similar directions as to appeals from magistrates, that which is directed to be done must be done in order to give the court jurisdiction. The directions are not mere directions, but they are conditions precedent to enable the court to hear the appeal. I therefore agree with the decision of the Divisional Court in South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. v. Stone. It is an authority directly in point, and we think it is right.

The directions, therefore, being conditions precedent to the hearing of the appeal, have they been complied with here? It is plain that they have not. The plaintiff's counsel stated orally to the magistrates at the hearing that he should apply for a case. The application was drawn up in writing, but instead of being sent to the justices it was simply served on their clerk. It was therefore, so far as we know, not called to the attention of the justices at all. The case of Ex parte Curtis, 3 Q. B. D. 13, shows that the application must be served on each of the justices who were parties to the proceeding. I think, therefore, that the condition was not complied with, and that the court had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think it is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion. We cannot overrule the long series of authorities which decide that such directions must be observed in order to entitle the court to hear the appeal.

Lopes, L.J.—I think that the directions given by rule 18 must be complied with before the court can hear the appeal. In this case there was no written application to the justices to state a case. That was, in my opinion, a condition precedent to the hearing of the appeal, and, the rule not having been complied with, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, and were right in refusing to hear it.

Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co. (a.)

Company—Contract by trustee for intended company—Ratification—New contract—Borrowing power over "properties and rights" of company—Mortgage of uncalled capital.

The directors of a company, in accordance with the provisions of its memorandum and articles, adopted an agreement entered into before its formation by a trustee for the company for the purchase of certain leasehold premises and other property (the vendor of which was one of the directors), the price having been previously varied with his consent by substituting debentures for cash payment. The leasehold premises were accordingly assigned to the company, who sealed the deed of assignment and took possession of the premises, and carried on their business there. And the debentures were issued to the vendor and his nominees.

The company was afterwards wound up, and the liquidator obtained from the vendor an assignment of the other property comprised in the agreement.

On a claim by the debenture holders to enforce their security,

Held, that there existed a contract between the company and the vendor to the effect of the previous agreement, with the variation as to payment, and that the debentures were issued for the purpose of such payment, and were valid.

Trial of issues in the action.

By an agreement of the 25th of April, 1885, T. R. Jordan agreed to sell to W. Wyber, as trustee on behalf of a company about to be formed under the name of the Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., a certain invention and patents for the same, and Jordan and R. E. Commans agreed to sell to the company certain leasehold premises, stock, and goodwill, for a sum of £36,500, payable £6,500 in cash to Jordan and Commans, and the balance in fully paid-up shares to them or their nominees.

The company was registered on the 29th of April, and the memorandum of association stated that the objects of the company were (inter alia) to adopt, ratify, and carry into effect (either with or without variation) the agreement of the 25th of April, 1885; to acquire the invention, patents, mills and premises, plant, machinery, stock in trade, and goodwill above-mentioned and other property; and to borrow money on behalf of the company, and mortgage, sell, and dispose of all or any part of the company's properties and rights.

The articles of association provided as follows:—(Art. 3) "The directors shall forthwith adopt, on behalf of the company, the agreement of the 25th of April, 1885, mentioned in the memorandum of association, and shall carry the same into effect, with full power, nevertheless, from time to time to agree to any modification thereof; (art. 94) the management of the business and the control of the company shall be vested in the directors, who, in addition to the powers and authorities by these articles expressly conferred on them, may exercise all such powers and do all such acts and things as may be exercised or done by the company, and are not hereby or by the statutes expressly directed or required to be exercised or done by the company in general meeting; but subject, nevertheless, to any regulations from time to time made by the company in general meeting, provided that no regulation shall invalidate any prior act of the directors which would have been valid if such regulation had not been made; (art. 95) without prejudice to the general powers conferred by the last preceding article, and of the other powers conferred by these articles, it is hereby expressly declared that the directors shall have the following powers (a) to execute all deeds and documents which they from time to time think necessary, and for that or any necessary or advisable purpose to use the common seal of the company, (b) to borrow from time to time, on behalf of the company, such sums of money not exceeding in the whole at any one time £1,000 as the directors think necessary or advisable; also to raise such further moneys as may be authorized from time to time by resolution of any general meeting of shareholders summoned for the purpose, (c) to secure the repayment of any moneys so borrowed together with interest, by debentures, mortgages, . . . or otherwise, and generally in such manner and upon such of the property and assets of the company and upon such terms and conditions as the directors may think fit.

At a meeting of the directors on the 27th of May, 1885, at which Jordan, who was a director, was present, it was resolved that the agreement of the 25th of April, 1885, should be and the same was thereby adopted.

At a similar meeting on the 6th of June, 1885, Jordan again being present, it was resolved that, in consideration of Jordan's accepting £3,000 in cash and £3,500 in debenture stock in the company, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum (the expression debenture stock being apparently used by inadvertence instead of debentures), an allotment of shares should be proceeded with, and an allotment of shares to Jordan and others was then made.

At a meeting on the 17th of June, Jordan again being present, it was resolved that the company's seal should be affixed to the agreement of the 25th of April, 1885—this, in fact, was never done—and to the thirty-five debentures of £100 each to Jordan and Commans in part payment of the £6,500; and to the deed of assignment of the leasehold premises. By this deed, which was executed by Jordan and by the company under their seal, after reciting the original lease and assignment to Jordan, the assent of the lessor to the assignment, and that Jordan had agreed to sell the premises to the company for £200, Jordan, in pursuance of that agreement, assigned the premises to the company. And the company thereupon entered into possession of the leasehold premises and carried on their business there. Also the thirty-five mortgage debentures were duly issued to Jordan and Commans, bearing interest at six per cent., and expressed to be a charge upon the company's "undertaking, and all its property, both present and future, including its capital for the time being uncalled."

On the 13th of September, 1886, the holders of these debentures, who were all directors of the company, gave notice calling in the principal money thereby secured, and on the 16th of September a petition was presented for winding up the company, on which, on the 6th of November, an order was made and an official liquidator appointed.

On the 3rd of March, 1887, by an indenture between Jordan of the first part, the company of the second part, and the liquidator of the third part, reciting the agreement of the 25th of April, 1885, the incorporation of the company, that the agreement was duly adopted by the company on the 27th of May, 1885, that the payment of cash and allotment of shares to Jordan as afterwards varied was agreed to by the company, and the grant of the letters patent, Jordan, at the request of the liquidator, assigned his interest in the letters patent to the company.

This action was brought by one of the holders of the thirty-five debentures on behalf of himself and the other debenture holders to establish and enforce their securities, and on the 31st of March, 1887, on the application of the plaintiff and Jordan, an order was made that the following issues be tried—(1) whether any and which of the thirty-five debentures were invalid, and (2) what property of the company was charged by such debentures?

Byrne, Q.C., and Spence, for the plaintiff and other debenture holders.—The directors had power to, and did, adopt the agreement of the 25th of April, 1885, as modified by the payment in debentures instead of cash, and this amounts to a new contract by the company with Jordan. Besides, the company entered and used the leasehold premises, and both the company and the liquidator took assignments thereof. The debentures were issued on account of a good debt from the company, and are therefore valid: Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co., 31 W. R. 96, 22 Ch. D. 61. [Kay, J., referred to Gregory v. Mighell, 18 Ves. 328, and Wilson v. West Hartlepool Railway Co., 13 W. R. 361, 2 De G. J. & S. 475.]

Millar, Q.C., and L. H. Rosenthal, for the liquidator.—The agreement of the 25th of April 1885 was not binding on the company, when formed, and there is no evidence of a new contract by the company: In re Express Engineering Co., 29 W. R. 342, 16 Ch. D. 125, and In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., 33 Ch. D. 16, 35 W. R. Dig. 38. At any rate, the directors had no power to borrow beyond £1,000, and the fact that the debentures were issued for a pre-existing debt is immaterial: In re Inns of Court Hotel Co., L. R. 6 Eq. 82, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 65; Landowners', &c., Co. v. Ashford, 16 Ch. D. 411, 29 W. R. Dig. 141; Irvine v. Union Bank of Australia, 25 W. R. 682, 2 App. Cas. 366. And the debentures are invalid so far as they affect unpaid capital: Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams, 23 W. R. 668, L. R. 6 P. C. 265; Stanley's case, 12 W. R. 894, 4 De G. J. & S. 407.

Byrne, in reply.—The power of borrowing under the memorandum of association is not limited by the power given by article 95. The words "properties and rights" of the company are sufficient to include unpaid capital.

Kay, J. [after referring to the memorandum and articles of association of the company as above set out, and stating the facts of the case, and observing that there could be no kind of doubt that the leasehold premises were assigned by Jordan to the company in pursuance of the arrangement made by the directors, of whom he was one, in his presence and with his assent, that the company should adopt the agreement made by Jordan before the company had been formed, continued as follows:—] The liquidator now comes here and, in the name of the company, says, "It is quite true that I have got all this property"—it is very nearly, I am told, all the property comprised in the agreement of the 25th of April, 1885—"it is quite true that the company, on the 27th of May, 1885, adopted the agreement by resolution, Mr. Jordan being present and assenting; and it is quite true that the agreement with Mr. Jordan was varied by inducing him to take instead of cash a certain amount of his payment in debentures, and thereupon these debentures were issued; now, with this deed in my hand, which I have myself obtained since the winding up, I say that the whole thing was void, and that these debenture-holders are entitled to nothing." Well, one would condemn that, if it were the act of an individual, rather strongly. It is said that companies have no conscience; but the liquidator of a company might as well have a conscience, especially when acting in the character of an officer of this court. This court does not allow itself to act dishonestly, and a more thoroughly dishonest proceeding than that would be I cannot well imagine.

But it is said that I am bound by authority. Now, how stands the law? It has been settled by numerous cases that where a company takes possession of landed property under a parol agreement, without having executed any document under its seal, or any writing signed by any agent (such as would satisfy the well known provisions of the 37th section of the Companies Act, 1867) such company may be just as much bound by the equitable rule of part performance, although it is a corporation, as an individual may be. There are many authorities on that point. They are all collected in the work of Fry, L.J., on Specific Performance (2nd ed., p. 280), but I will refer to one case, to which I called the attention of counsel during the argument, which contains the expression of the opinion of a the most eminent judges we have had of late years—the late Lord Justice Turner. In the case of Wilson v. The West Hartlepool Railway Co. that learned judge says: "It was contended on their part that companies are not bound by acts of part performance, and that the acts which have been done in this case furnish no equity against the defendants, because they are acts to the prejudice of the defendants only, and not of the plaintiff; but I cannot accede to either of these arguments. Neither of them is, in my opinion, consistent with the principle on which this court proceeds in cases of part performance. The court proceeds in such cases on the ground of fraud, and I cannot hold that acts which, if done by an individual, would amount to a fraud, ought not to be so considered if done by a company, nor can I say that it is no prejudice to the plaintiff to have been permitted to take possession on the faith of an agreement, and afterwards to be held liable to be treated as a trespasser and turned out of possession on the ground that there was no agreement. There is authority for saying that in the eye of this court it is a fraud to set up the absence of agreement when possession has been given upon the faith of it." That is a very distinct decision which, so far as I know, has never been departed from, that the rule of equity that part performance will take a case out of the Statute of Frauds applies to an incorporated company, and that an incorporated company which comes within that doctrine of part performance is just as much bound by it as if it were an individual. In the same case there is a summary of another part of the law to which I have often had occasion to refer: "Where possession has been given on the faith of an agreement, it is, I think, the duty of the court, as far as it is possible to do so, to ascertain the terms of the agreement and to give effect to it."

But then it is said that here there was no agreement between the company and Mr. Jordan. There was an agreement between Mr. Jordan and a person who professed to be trustee for the company before the company was formed. But that agreement, it is said, is completely null and void, and could not be ratified by the company; and, under the circumstances, the court cannot infer that there ever was an agreement, either parol or otherwise, between Mr. Jordan and the company. The authorities for that are some well-known cases, all of which, I believe, proceed upon the case of Kelner v. Baxter, 15 W. R. 276, L. R. 2 C. P. 174. The case mainly relied upon is In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., but before proceeding to consider that I will notice another case in which the decision was in favour of the company—In re The Empress Engineering Co. I notice that case for this reason, that the late Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, in giving judgment, said:—"The contract between the promoters and the so-called agent for the company, of course, was not a contract binding upon the company, for the company had then no existence, nor could it become binding on the company by ratification, because it has been decided, and, as it appears to me, well decided, that there cannot in law be an effectual ratification of a contract which could not have been made binding on the ratifier at the time it was made, because the ratifier was not then in existence." But he adds this:—"It does not follow from that that acts may not be done by the company after its formation which make a new contract to the same effect as the old one, but that stands on a different principle." That is to say, recognizing entirely the well-settled law that a company is bound by acts of part performance, and that when you find a company in possession of the property of another person you are bound, if you can, to refer that possession, not to trespass, but to contract, and as Turner, L.J., said in the words I have quoted, to find out, if you possibly can, what that contract is, the Master of the Rolls excepts from the judgment which he is giving in that case, cases of that kind where there have been acts of a company from which you can infer, and from which you ought to infer, that there was a contract by the company after its formation.

Now the case mainly relied upon—namely, In re the Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co.—is certainly one of very considerable difficulty, but in order to ascertain whether it binds me here to hold that there was no contract, I must see whether the facts were the same. In the first place, before I refer to that case, I must observe that the question whether there was a contract between this company and Mr. Jordan is a question, not of law, but of fact. Am I bound, because in one case the court, upon evidence before it, came to the conclusion as a matter of fact that there was no written contract, to hold that in this case there was no such written contract? The finding of a jury upon one set of facts does not bind the jury upon another set of facts; nor does the finding of any court bind another court where the facts are not the same.

In the case of In re the Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co. the facts were these:—Wallis having negotiated with the Metropolitan Board of Works for a grant to him of a lease of certain land for eighty years at a large rent upon his erecting certain buildings within a specified time, entered into an agreement in writing with them on the 2nd of October, 1882. But before he had got his own agreement, an agreement dated the 24th of July, 1882, had been entered into between one Nunneley and Doyle "as trustee for and on behalf of an intended company to be called the Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co. (limited)," which recited that Nunneley, as agent for and on behalf of Wallis, had agreed to grant to the company, and that Doyle, on behalf of the company, had agreed to take, an underlease, subject to certain conditions, for eighty years less one day of the original lease. The agreement contained stipulations like those in ordinary building agreements, and by clause 23, reciting that Wallis was negotiating for further plots of land, the company purported to agree (for they were not then in existence) to become lessees of them at such rent and upon such conditions as might be agreed upon between them and Wallis. So far that case was quite like the present case. The contract to which I have just referred was made before the company was formed; of course, it could not bind an unformed company which was formed afterwards. The company was formed the next day, the 25th of July. The agreement was not mentioned in the memorandum of association, but the 2nd clause of the articles of association purported to adopt it, and provided that the company should carry it into effect, subject to any modification which might be agreed upon between Nunneley and the company. The company, after their incorporation, did not enter into any further agreement in writing with Wallis, but they acted on the agreement of the 24th of July, 1882—that is to say, the agreement made before the company was formed. The company took possession of the ground and spent £40,000 in building upon it. There was no note or memorandum of contract with Wallis or seal on behalf of the company after their incorporation. Wallis afterwards commenced an action against the company for specific performance of the 23rd clause of the agreement, by which they were to take certain other plots of land from him. This action was compromised, and the company agreed to accept a lease of the additional ground. That agreement, of course, did not at all refer to the rest of the contract between them. The company paid the rent to Wallis, and several resolutions were passed, with the assent of Wallis, purporting to modify some of the terms of the agreement of the 24th of July, 1882, but none of these modifications were carried into effect by means of any written document.

Now I confess that that last part of the case does seem to me to create very considerable difficulty. If the company did agree with Wallis to modify the original agreement I should have thought on the face of it, though, of course, I am wrong, that there was enough evidence to justify the court in inferring that they had entered into an agreement with Wallis to the same effect as that original agreement, especially when you couple with that the fact that they had taken possession of the land. However, what actually occurred was this: afterwards the company did not get sufficient capital to enable them to continue their works, and Wallis served them with notice to re-enter. On the 13th of May, 1884, the Metropolitan Board of Works, the ground landlords, the original lessors to Wallis, put an end to the agreement with Wallis; so that the property was entirely recovered under a title paramount by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and they resumed possession. Then the company was wound up, and Wallis became bankrupt, and the trustee in bankruptcy of Wallis took out a summons to be admitted a creditor for damages for breach of the agreement. The thing was gone, and the court had to consider whether there had been a binding agreement under the circumstances between Wallis and the company, and such breach of it as entitled his trustee in bankruptcy to prove for damages against the company. These are the material parts of the judgments. Cotton, L.J., said: "But it is said that we ought to hold that there was a contract entered into between the company and Wallis on the same terms (except so far as they were subsequently modified) as those contained in the contract of the 24th of July, 1882. In my opinion that will not hold. It is very true that there were transactions between Wallis and the company in which the company acted on the terms of that contract entered into with Wallis by the person who said he was trustee for them. But why did the company do so? The company seem to have considered, or rather its directors seem to have considered, that the contract was a contract binding on the company. But the erroneous opinion that a contract entered into before the company came into existence was binding on the company, and the acting on that erroneous opinion, does not make a good contract between the company and Mr. Wallis; and all the acts which occurred subsequently to the existence of the company were acts proceeding on the erroneous assumption that the contract of the 24th of July was binding on the company. In my opinion that explains the whole of these transactions. The case is entirely different from those cases which have been referred to where the court, finding a person in possession of land of a corporation, and paying rent, has held that there was a contract of tenancy. There was no mode of explaining why the occupier was there, except a tenancy, unless he was to be treated as a trespasser. The receipt of rent by the corporation negatived his being a trespasser, and it was therefore held that there was a tenancy. Here we can account, and in my opinion we ought to account, for the possession by the company, and for what it has done, by reference to the agreement of the 24th of July, which the directors erroneously and wrongly assumed to be binding upon them." Then Lindley, L.J., said that he was of the same opinion, and added: "The more closely the case is investigated the more plainly does it appear that there never was any contract between the company and Wallis." That was a finding, as I have said, of fact.

Now, am I bound to find that there never was any contract as a result of the facts proved in the present case? Here there was passed in Mr. Jordan's presence a resolution of the board of directors, to which he was a party, adopting this agreement. There was the conveyance by Mr. Jordan of the leasehold property comprised in the agreement, and the seal of the company was affixed to it—clearly and obviously carrying out the contract between Mr. Jordan and the company, which the company, by that adoption, seem to me distinctly to have made. There were no such facts as these in the case of In re the Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co. Besides all that, I have here the payment of part of the price in debentures. That was a variation of the contract made by distinct agreement with Mr. Jordan, after the passing of a resolution for the issue of the debentures contemporaneously with the deed by which Mr. Jordan assigned part of the property to the company. After the winding up the liquidator took an assignment of all the rest of the property of which he could possibly get an assignment in pursuance of the very same arrangement. Now he comes to the court and asks the court to say that there never was a contract between the company and Mr. Jordan. He says "True I have taken from Mr. Jordan everything I could possibly get from him. The company took an assignment of the leasehold premises which they have held ever since. I have treated all these as assets of the company, and I now turn round and say that there never was such an agreement." Such a course of conduct would be, as I have characterized it during the argument, the most flagrant dishonesty. It is saying "You shall not be paid for the property at all." I should not hold that unless I were bound by authorities very much more stringent than those which have been cited. Nor do I think that any branch of the court would hold anything of that kind. In my opinion it is very clear that there was a contract between Mr. Jordan and the company. That is the only possible inference I can draw from the facts which I have stated. Therefore, so far as that matter goes, I think it is perfectly plain that the money for which these debentures were issued in payment was due at the date when the debentures were issued, because I am quite clear that this contract existed on the 17th of June, and indeed on the 27th of May, when Mr. Jordan agreed with the other directors that the contract should be adopted as between himself and the company.

Then I have to consider certain other points which have been raised. One of them is this. It is said that these debentures, on the face of them, purport to bind the undertaking and all the property of the company, both present and future, including the capital for the time being uncalled; and it is said that that is invalid. The authority cited in support of that proposition is Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams, in which, there being a power to directors to charge the property of the company, it was held that that did not authorize them to include in such charge future calls—or, in other words, the unpaid capital of the company. In Stanley's case, which was there approved, there was a power to charge the property and funds of the company. But in the present case the terms of the memorandum of association, which, as Lord Cairns said in Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche, 24 W. R. 794, L. R. 7 H. L. 653, at p. 668, is "the charter of the company," were these—"To borrow money on behalf of the company, and to mortgage, sell, or dispose of all or any part of the company's property and rights." It is one thing to say that the power of mortgaging the property of a company does not authorize the mortgage of that which at the time was not its property but might thereafter become its property; but it is quite another thing, and it is going much further, to say that a power to mortgage the rights of a company does not authorize a mortgage of a right which the company has, by contract, to call up the uncalled capital. In my opinion these debentures were framed rightly enough, and do include the uncalled capital.

Now, it has not been denied that, to the extent to which there was a bonâ fide debt, it was legitimate to issue debentures to the creditor, and to treat that as a borrowing. That has been decided in several of the cases that were cited—as, for instance, In re The Imo of Court Hotel Co., and Landowners', &c., Co. v. Ashford. I have no doubt that that is the law, and the reason for it is quite clear and obvious. If you might not issue debentures to a creditor under a borrowing power it would come to this, that you would have to issue debentures to the bankers, or to somebody else, who would advance the money, and then pay that money over to the creditor, or issue debentures to the creditor himself, he lending you money first, and then you paying it back to him. Of course, it is obvious that such a roundabout proceeding as that need not be resorted to, and the court looks to the substance of the matter. Therefore the issue of debentures under the borrowing power to a person who is already a creditor of the company may well be treated as a proper issue of debentures.

But then a very much more serious question has been raised, and that is this. These debentures were issued by the directors, and it is said that the power of the directors to issue debentures is limited; and the limit is very plain when you look at article 95, which is as follows:—The directors are empowered "to borrow from time to time on behalf of the company such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole at any one time £1,000, as the directors think necessary or advisable, also to raise such further moneys as may be authorised from time to time by resolution of any general meeting of shareholders summoned for the purpose." So that when the directors have borrowed up to £1,000, and there are existing loans unpaid to that amount, the borrowing power of the directors is exhausted, and no more can be borrowed without the authority of a general meeting of shareholders. Then the next article is, "To secure the repayment of any moneys so borrowed, together with the interest, by debentures." Therefore the directors could only issue valid debentures for moneys borrowed by themselves, without the assent of a general meeting, to the extent of the borrowing power; beyond that, in order to authorize themselves to borrow and to issue debentures, there must be the assent of the general meeting.

Now, in this case, unfortunately for the holders of these debentures, they are all directors, and therefore the well-known authorities which make it necessary to see whether the internal regulations of a company have been observed or not, do not apply; because, of course, the directors must be taken to know that the internal requirements of the company had not been observed in the case of these debentures. Accordingly, I am very sorry to say that I cannot treat the debentures as valid to the extent of more than £1,000. How that sum is to allotted between the different parties I do not know. I have heard nothing on that point. I must treat the issue of the debentures as being invalid within the knowledge of the directors beyond the amount of £1,000.

There must be a declaration that the first ten only of the thirty-five debentures, taking them according to their numbers, are valid.

Manisty v. Churchill. (a.)

Principal and surety—Crown debt—Payment of debt by surety—Rights of surety—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 5.

A surety who has paid a debt due to the Crown from his deceased principal debtor is entitled to stand in the places of the Crown, and to be admitted as a creditor of the estate of the principal debtor in priority to all other creditors.

Adjourned summons.

On the 8th of July, 1875, Francis George, Lord Churchill entered into a bond with the Crown for the payment by instalments of £500 each of a sum of £7,083 4*s.* 5*d.*, being the amount of principal, interest, and costs due from him in respect of money in his hands as Commandant of the Queen's Own Oxfordshire Yeomanry, for the recovery of which proceedings had been instituted in the Court of Exchequer at the suit of the Attorney-General.

At the same time, and as a part of the arrangement, Francis Nathaniel, Marquis Conyngham entered into a bond of equal date as surety for Lord Churchill for payment of any balance which should remain unpaid at the death of the latter.

The Marquis Conyngham died on the 17th of July, 1876, and his will was proved in the Principal Registry of the Probate Division of her Majesty's High Court of Justice on the 25th of August, 1876, the present trustees being Sir Theodore Henry Brinckman and William Henry Saltwell.

The instalments of £500 agreed to be paid by Lord Churchill, as mentioned in his bond, were paid up to the 1st of May, 1879, but in consequence of the agricultural depression no payment was ever made by him after that date, and in 1880 a writ of extent was issued and an inquisition was held, but without effect, his lordship's real estate being subject to prior incumbrances and charges which left no margin available to answer the Crown debt.

Lord Churchill died on the 24th of November, 1886, intestate.

On the 5th of January, 1887, Sir Theodore Henry Brinckman and William Henry Saltwell, as trustees of the will of The Marquis Conyngham, and in pursuance of the bond entered into by him with the Crown, paid to the Crown the sum of £5,171 13*s.* 9*d.*, being the balance of the principal remaining due at the death of Lord Churchill under his bond, with the interest due thereon, for which sum a receipt was given by the solicitor for the affairs of her Majesty's Treasury and indorsed upon the bond entered into by the Marquis Conyngham, which receipt is as follows:—

"Received this 5th day of January, 1887, of Sir Theodore Henry Brinckman, Baronet, and William Henry Saltwell, trustees of the estate of the within-named Francis Nathaniel, Marquis Conyngham, the sum of £5,171 13*s.* 9*d.*, in full discharge of the principal money and interest secured by the within-written bond, which is hereby delivered up, together with the within-mentioned bond of Francis George Spencer, Baron Churchill.

"Augustus K. Stephenson,
"Solicitor for the Affairs of her Majesty's Treasury."

The Crown debt was never registered nor was a writ of execution ever registered in respect of the same debt.

The action was brought by the trustees of the Law Life Insurance Office, on behalf of themselves and all other creditors of the late Lord Churchill, for the administration of his estate, which is insolvent, the defendant being the administrator of the estate.

This was a summons by Sir Theodore Henry Brinckman and William Henry Saltwell as trustees of the late Marquis Conyngham, who, having paid out of their testator's estate £5,171 13*s.* 9*d.*, the amount of the debt due to the Crown, claimed as representatives of the surety to have the same rights against the estate of the intestate principal debtor, and to have the same priority in the administration of his estate, as the Crown would have had, their claim to priority being opposed by the plaintiffs in the action.

Cookson Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Method, for the plaintiffs.—Although the Crown may be entitled to priority in payment of its debts, yet the surety who has paid a Crown debt of his principal debtor is not entitled to the priority of the Crown as against personal estate. The cases of Reg. v. Bennett and Reg. v. Doughty deal with extents, and are not in point.

They referred to the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 40; the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 5; In re Russell, 29 Ch. D. 254, 33 W. R. Dig. 170; In re M'Myn.

North, J.—I think that the claim of the applicant is well founded. The claim is for a debt in respect of which the Crown is entitled to priority because of its right to be paid in preference to other creditors. By the ordinary rule a surety has a clear well-founded right on general principle to stand in the place of the creditor against the estate of the debtor whose debt the surety has paid. There used to be a technical difficulty which prevented him from obtaining his remedy in some cases. That difficulty was removed by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, which provides, by section 5, that a surety for the debt of another who pays such debt shall be entitled to have assigned to him every judgment, specialty, or other security which shall be held by the creditor in respect of such debt "whether such judgment, specialty, or other security shall or shall not be deemed at law to have been satisfied by the payment of the debt . . . and such person shall be entitled to stand in the place of the creditor and to use all the remedies . . . of the creditor." In the present case the surety has paid the debt of the principal debtor which was due to the Crown, and is entitled to priority independently of that Act. He is entitled to use the words of the Act "to stand in the place of the creditor and to use all the remedies" of the creditor in order to obtain indemnification. The right of the Crown was transferred to the surety, and he is entitled to recover what the Crown could have recovered from the estate of the debtor. If authority were wanting the case of In re M'Myn shows that where the creditor has a right to be paid before other creditors, the surety who has paid the debt due to the creditor has by the general law the right to the same priority. In that case the creditor whose debt the surety paid had a right to be paid first through having got a judgment. I see no difference between that case and the case of priority being obtained by the general law. It seems to me immaterial whether the right of priority was gained by reason of the creditor having obtained a judgment, or by reason of the creditor having been the Crown. I am of opinion that the applicants are entitled to stand in the place of the Crown, and to be admitted as creditors of the intestate's estate in priority to all other creditors.

Practice — Adjourned summons — Evidence filed after hearing by chief clerk—Time for filing evidence fixed by chief clerk.

On the hearing of an adjourned summons evidence filed after the time fixed by the chief clerk for the filing of evidence cannot be used unless special leave to use fresh evidence has been given either by the judge or the chief clerk.

This rule does not apply where no time has been fixed for the filing of evidence.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons by a purchaser of property sold in the action under the direction of the court asking for a declaration that he was entitled to compensation in respect of an alleged misdescription of the property in the particulars of sale, and that the amount of the compensation might be determined.

The summons was heard by the chief clerk on the 19th of March, and on the 20th of March he expressed his opinion that the purchaser was entitled to compensation. At the request of the vendors the summons was adjourned into court.

On the 15th of May the vendors filed two fresh affidavits. No time had been fixed within which affidavits were to be filed.

The summons now came on for hearing, and the purchaser objected to the new affidavits being used.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Beaumont, for the vendors.—These affidavits could be used in the Appeal Court without leave, this being an interlocutory application: ord. 58, r. 4. We ask, therefore, to be allowed to use them now.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., and G. H. Lea, for the purchaser.—This is not an interlocutory application; it is an application in the nature of an action, and ought, therefore, to be governed by the same rules. The vendors ought not, therefore, to be allowed to use these affidavits.

North, J.—I think I must allow these affidavits to be used, but the vendors must pay the costs of the day. The purchaser must have an opportunity of answering them, and he must file his evidence in reply within ten days. I consider that the chief clerk's fixing a time within which evidence is to be filed is exactly the same thing as if the judge fixed the time. The hearing of an application before the chief clerk is exactly the same as the hearing before the judge, subject to this, that the parties have a right, if they so desire, to have the matter heard by the judge personally. I have not the slightest doubt as to the power of a judge in chambers to fix a time for the filing of evidence on any application. In future I shall allow no affidavit to be used before me which has been filed after the time fixed by the chief clerk for the filing of evidence unless I have given special leave to use new evidence, or unless the chief clerk has done so, which is the same thing. This rule will not necessarily apply to affidavits filed after the hearing by the chief clerk if no time has been fixed. I must deal with such cases as best I can when they arise.

[During the hearing Mr. Lavie, the registrar, referred the court to a manuscript note of a case of In re Pooley (before the Court of Appeal on May 6, 1885), in which, objection having been taken to the reading of an affidavit which had not been before the chief clerk in chambers, Cotton, L.J., said that all affidavits filed before the matter came before the judge in court could be used if proper notice were given, even though they had not been used before the chief clerk. It did not appear that any time had been fixed for the filing of affidavits.]

RICHARDSON v. FEARY. (a.)

Partition—Sale—Application for sale by owner of less than a moiety of the property—Discretion of court—Partition Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 40), s. 5.

Upon the application for a sale of property by the owner of less than a moiety under section 5 of the Partition Act, 1868, the court will not direct a sale, even though none of the other persons interested undertake to purchase the applicant's share, unless the applicant shows some good reason why a sale should be made.

Further consideration.

This was a partition action in which the plaintiff claimed a sale of the property and division of the proceeds of sale among the persons interested, or, in the alternative, a partition. At the trial of the action an inquiry was directed who were the persons interested in the property, and for what estates and interests, and in what shares and proportions. The chief clerk, by his certificate, found that the plaintiff Elizabeth Richardson, widow, was absolutely entitled to one undivided eighth share, that the defendant Neville Feary was absolutely entitled to two undivided eighth shares, subject to certain incumbrances created by him, that the defendant Neville Feary was entitled to an undivided eighth share as the surviving trustee of the marriage settlement of the defendants Thomas Cooke and Susannah, his wife, that the defendant Susannah Cooke and her husband in her right was absolutely entitled (subject to certain incumbrances) to another undivided eighth share, that the defendant Ann Matilda Nix, widow, was absolutely entitled (subject to a mortgage) to two undivided eighth shares, and that the defendants Neville Feary and Thomas Cooke, as trustees of the married settlement of Hannah Aiken, were entitled to the remaining undivided eighth share.

The action now came on for further consideration. The plaintiff desired that the property should be sold.

Farwell, for the plaintiff.—Section 5 of the Partition Act, 1868, gives any person interested in the property a right to a sale, unless the other parties interested, or some of them, agree to buy him out, or, if they do not do this, they must show some good reason why a sale should not be directed.

He referred to Drinkwater v. Ratcliffe, 24 W. R. 25, L. R. 20 Eq. 528; Williams v. Games, 23 W. R. 779, L. R. 10 Ch. 204; and Pitt v. Jones, 29 W. R. 33, 5 App. Cas. 651.

Le Riche, for Mr. and Mrs. Cooke, supported the request for sale.

Comens-Hardy, Q.C., and Leonard Field, for the defendants Neville Feary and Mrs. Nix, Vernon R. Smith, for the mortgagees of Neville Feary, and

P. F. Wheeler, for a mortgagee of Mrs. Nix, all of whom opposed a sale, were not called on.

NORTH, J.—In a proper case the court could direct a sale under section 3 of the Act. The present application for a sale is not made under section 3, but under section 5, and it follows that none of the circumstances mentioned in section 3 as justifying the court in ordering a sale of the property exist here. It cannot be said that for any of the reasons mentioned in section 3 a sale of the property and a distribution of the proceeds would be more beneficial for the parties interested than a distribution of the property between them. Under section 4 it is not open to the court to refuse a request for a sale of the property made by a party or parties interested to the extent of a moiety in the property "unless it sees good reason to the contrary." The words of section 4 are much stronger than those of either section 3 or section 5. Then section 5 says that, if any party interested requests a sale instead of a partition, the court may, "if it thinks fit," direct a sale, unless the other parties interested undertake to purchase the share of the party requesting a sale. I have been asked to construe this section as if it was expressed in the same terms as section 4, as meaning that, if any party requests a sale the court shall direct a sale, unless it sees good reason to the contrary. The difference between the language of the two sections is significant, and I have no doubt that section 5 was intended to give the court a different power from that which is given by section 4. I do not think that Williams v. Games has any application to the present case.

In Drinkwater v. Ratcliffe Sir G. Jessel, M.R., said, "The 5th section provides that if any party interested in the property requests the court to direct a sale of the property instead of a division, the court may, if it thinks fit (this is discretionary again), unless the other parties interested in the property undertake to purchase, give all necessary and proper directions for such sale. What does that mean? Under the 4th, where the parties requesting a sale have got more than a moiety you do not want that; it consequently applies to the case of the owners of less than a moiety making the request. Now that case is provided for by the 3rd section, in every possible case where the court thinks a sale is proper, and for the benefit of the parties interested. Therefore the 5th must apply to a case where the court sees no reason for preferring a sale to a partition. That case is not provided for by the 3rd, nor is it provided for by the 4th section. Where the court sees no reason at all, still any party interested may apply." That is quite a different thing from saying that, if the court sees no reason at all for preferring a sale to a partition, it shall, on the application of any party interested, direct a sale. Pitt v. Jones is not a direct authority on the present question, though no doubt there were some observations made by Lord Watson which do give some colour to Mr. Farwell's argument. But those observations were addressed to an entirely different question — viz., whether, when one party desired to have a sale, and the other parties were willing to purchase his share, he could be compelled to sell his share at the valuation made of it? I do not think there is anything in Pitt v. Jones which obliges me to hold that where a power is given to the court to direct a sale "if it thinks fit," it is compelled to order a sale, especially having regard to what Sir G. Jessel, M.R., said in Drinkwater v. Ratcliffe. In Pitt v. Jones Lord Blackburn said, "Section 5 says that in every case of a suit for partition (whether the sale would or would not be more beneficial for the parties than a partition) if any party (whether owning more or less than a moiety) requests a sale, the court shall have a discretion to order such a sale, unless the parties opposing a sale are willing to take his share at a valuation. But it does not say, nor do I think it was intended to say, that a party who requests a sale of the whole must take that valuation; I think it means that if a party presses for a sale, and the court thinks that the opposing parties in fairness ought either to buy him out or consent to a sale, it may order a sale unless they will agree to take his valuation, in which case the party requesting a sale may either accept that valuation or not. If he does not choose to accept that valuation he cannot be forced to do so, but will then have his common law right to a partition." In these remarks, if I may say so, I entirely concur. But here the party who is pressing for a sale has not satisfied me that in fairness the parties who oppose a sale ought either to buy him out or to submit to have the property sold. The majority of the judges in Pitt v. Jones took the same view of section 5 as I do. Lord Watson no doubt went further than any of the other noble lords, but he was not actually dealing with the present question. I think that section 5 is not synonymous with section 4, but the party who applies under section 5 for a sale must show some reason for it. I think the court has a discretion whether it will direct a sale, and no reason has been shown to induce me to do so.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C.—A partition ought not to be made as between the owners of the six-eighths, as they do not desire it. [North, J.—Have they any right to cut off a portion of the property and give it to the plaintiff?] The plaintiff is entitled to his share, but it is not necessary that, in making a partition, an aliquot share of each species of property should be allotted to each of the tenants in common: Hobson v. Sherwood, 4 Beav. 184; Peers v. Needham, 2 W. R. 514, 19 Beav. 316.

North, J.—I see no difficulty in allotting six parts to the owners of six undivided eighths as tenants in common. If all the persons interested in one-eighth agree with all those who are interested in another one-eighth that they will do so, they can remain tenants in common.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C.—No costs ought to be given up to the trial of the action: Porter v. Lopes, 7 Ch. D. 358, 26 W. R. Dig. 157.

Farwell.—The usual rule is that the costs shall be borne by the parties in proportion to their interests: Ball v. Kemp Welch, 14 Ch. D. 512, 28 W. R. Dig. 66.

North, J.—In the present case no benefit has been derived from the Partition Act. I shall, therefore, adopt the old rule of the Court of Chancery, and shall give no costs up to the date of the inquiry. The subsequent costs will be borne rateably.

Postlethwaite v. Rickman. (a.)

Trustee—Purchase of trust estate in name of stranger—Repurchase by trustee—Onus of proof.

A testator devised his property, including the S. Farm, to A., B., and C., upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds amongst several persons, A. being one. By deed dated the 24th of March, 1854, A., B., and C., as trustees, conveyed this farm to W. for £1,814 17s. 2d. In June, 1854, W. reconveyed the farm to B. for £1,831 9s. 7d. In July, 1870, B. purchased with his own moneys the X. property for £787 11s., and in 1874 he sold the S. Farm and X. to M. for £9,587 10s.

Held, that the purchase by W. as nominee of B. vitiated the repurchase by B., and that his representatives must account for the profits made by the different dealings with the trust property.

Held, also, that the burden of proof lies on the plaintiff in a case of repurchase by a trustee where the facts are known to both parties.

Trial of action.

William Postlethwaite, who died in 1843, devised his property to J. L. Postlethwaite, W. C. Rickman, and the defendant, J. J. Tourle, upon trust to sell and divide the same amongst several persons, of whom J. L. Postlethwaite was one. Part of the property consisted of Standfast Farm, in the county of Southampton. In March, 1854, the three trustees of the will conveyed the farm to one Walker, who paid a sum of £1,814 17s. 2d. In June, 1854, Walker reconveyed the farm to W. C. Rickman, one of the trustees, for his own use for £1,831 9s. 7d. In July, 1870, W. C. Rickman purchased an adjoining property called Snailings for £787 11s., and in 1874 he sold the whole of both properties to another person for £9,587 10s. J. L. Postlethwaite died in May, 1871, and W. C. Rickman in June, 1886, and this action was brought in November, 1886, by J. R. Postlethwaite, W. E. G. Postlethwaite, and Josephine Postlethwaite, the children and persons entitled to the estate of J. L. Postlethwaite against E. F. Rickman and E. J. Hone, the executors of W. C. Rickman, and J. J. Tourle, the surviving trustee and executor of the testator. The plaintiffs alleged that in the matter of the agreement for the purchase of Standfast Farm, Walker was really a trustee for W. C. Rickman, and was put forward by the latter as the purchaser in order to conceal from the persons interested in the testator's estate the fact that W. C. Rickman was the real purchaser, and in consequence of his having been advised that, as a trustee of the will, he could not purchase the property. They also alleged that J. L. Postlethwaite never knew or had notice that Walker purchased as such trustee or agent for W. C. Rickman, or that the property had ever been assured to Rickman, and that they first knew it in July, 1886. And they claimed a declaration that the conveyance of March, 1854, was not binding upon them, and that the defendants were jointly and severally liable to make good to the plaintiffs their proportion of the profits realized by W. C. Rickman by the enjoyment and resale of the premises.

The claim against Tourle was withdrawn at the hearing.

Warmington, Q.C., and A. Terrell, for the plaintiffs.

Rigby, Q.C., and Rowden, for the defendants.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Kekewich, J.—The transaction sought to be set aside took place in 1854, thirty-two years before the date of the commencement of this action. But the plaintiffs, until 1886, had no knowledge or notice of the facts on which they found their claim, so, if they establish their case, they are not barred by laches, though, from lapse of time, it is difficult for them to do so. A purchase by a trustee of property intrusted to him for sale is held improper, on the ground that it is impossible for any man to be at the same time buyer and seller. The plaintiffs say it was a breach of duty on the part of W. C. Rickman to purchase this property, even at the best price, and that, whether that be fraud or not, that is enough. I think it is a legal fraud as defined in Peek v. Gurney, 37 Ch. D. 541. There is a moral duty to observe the terms of a contract, and a breach of that duty may be styled fraud. The law is expounded in Ex parte Lacey, 6 Ves. 625, and has never been questioned. The difficulty in each case is to discover whether there has been a purchase of this kind, and the question is a mixed one of law and fact. Baker v. Peck,

9 W. R. 186, 472, and Hall v. Hallet, 1 Cox, 134, are of very little help. The rule against a purchase by a trustee for sale has ever been strictly applied to an executor who necessarily occupies that position. Mellish, L.J., in Parker v. McKenna, 23 W. R. 271, at p. 281, L. R. 10 Ch. 96, at p. 125, considers that, as long as the contract remains executory, and the trustee or agent has power either to enforce or rescind or alter it, he cannot repurchase the property from his own purchaser, except for the benefit of his principal, but the observations which follow show that the Lord Justice did not intend to decide that when once the contract is executed the trustee can purchase for his own benefit. And a trustee cannot attain this end by selling to a nominee if the latter finds the money or subjects himself to covenants under an agreement for indemnity.

In the case of a promise not legally enforceable, if that promise be performed, so that the selling trustee obtains the benefit of the purchase, he cannot hold it against the cestui que trust. If a trustee sell to a stranger over whom he has some influence with a feeling of certainty that he would be allowed to repurchase if he wished, he can hold that against his cestui que trust, and the repurchase would not be vitiated. But where there is an understanding, not expressed, but which is binding between friends and gentlemen, the repurchase by the trustee, on the strength of that understanding, cannot be held good, even though there be no corresponding right on the part of the first purchaser to be relieved by the trustee. [His lordship then discussed and commented on the facts, and continued :—] The plaintiffs cannot depend on the weakness of the defendants' case; it is for them to establish the facts necessary to entitle them to relief. This I hold they have done.

Practice—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 3, r. 6; ord. 14, r. 1—Writ specially indorsed—Final judgment.

A writ which claims payment of a sum which is in dispute, besides payment of a liquidated demand, is not specially indorsed so as to entitle the plaintiff to summary judgment for the liquidated demand.

In this action, which was brought by a landlord against his tenant, the writ was indorsed with a claim for

Rent	£68 15 0
Making good dilapidations . .	289 16 0
	£358 11 0
By unexhausted manures, &c. .	58 10 0

This was an appeal from an order of Cave, J., in chambers, rescinding an order of a master who had given judgment for the plaintiff under ord. 14, r. 1, for £68 15s., and had given leave to defend as to the rest of the claim.

* See Barrow's case, 14 Ch. D., at p. 445.

Crawford, for the plaintiff, contended that, as the claim for rent was admitted, the master was right in giving judgment for that part of the claim, it being a "debt or liquidated demand in money" under ord. 3, r. 6.

Vaughan Williams, for the defendant, cited Imbert-Terry v. Carver, 35 W. R. 328, 34 Ch. D. 506.

Crawford, in reply, contended that Hill v. Sidebottom, 47 L. T. N. S. 224, 31 W. R. Dig. 157, was in his favour.

Manisty, J.—The only question in this case is whether or not the indorsement on the writ is "special." Order 14, under which this judgment was made, only applies to writs specially indorsed under order 3, and we must look at this writ and at ord. 3, r. 6, which tells us what a specially indorsed writ is. Now this writ seems to me to include a demand which both parties agree is unliquidated and disputed. The £68 15s. for the rent is not disputed, but as to the £289 16s. there is some valuation which is the subject of dispute between the parties. There are decisions as to the reading of ord. 3, r. 6. In Hill v. Sidebottom something more than a liquidated demand was claimed, and for that reason it was held that the writ was not specially indorsed under ord. 3, r. 6. That case was followed in Imbert-Terry v. Carver, where equitable relief was sought as well as payment of a liquidated demand. There must not be something in addition to a "debt or liquidated demand." It seems to me that the master was clearly wrong in giving judgment for the £68 15s.

Stephen, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that in this case the plaintiff claims something more than a liquidated demand. The valuation by which the sum of £289 16s. was arrived at is challenged, and it cannot therefore be considered to be a liquidated demand.

The appeal must be dismissed, with costs to the defendant in any event.

Negligence—Volenti non fit injuria—Voluntary undertaking of risk by plaintiff—Question of fact—Finding at the trial—Inference of fact for the court.

When, in an action of negligence, the defendant relies on the doctrine Volenti non fit injuria, he must obtain a finding at the trial that the plaintiff voluntarily took the risk upon himself and had a full knowledge of the nature and extent of the danger. Otherwise the court will not give judgment for the defendant on the ground that such a finding is the only inference which can properly be drawn from the facts.

Appeal from a judgment of the judge of the county court of Warwickshire, holden at Birmingham.

The plaintiff sought to recover damages from the defendant company for injuries sustained by him in falling down on a flight of steps leading to the platform of the defendants' station at Perry Bar, by reason of the worn and defective condition of the steps and the defendants' negligence in not clearing the steps of snow and ice. The plaintiff, in his evidence, said that he lived at Perry Bar, and was a season-ticket holder on the defendants' line; on the 21st of March, 1887, he was going down the stone steps leading from the road to the platform, to get by train to Birmingham; the steps were covered with a light layer of snow, which had been trodden down and had frozen again; the steps were worn and hollowed and slippery; he went down carefully, but at the fourth or fifth step he slipped and fell and dislocated his wrist. In cross-examination he said that there were also some wooden steps, but the stone steps were nearest to his house; the steps were dangerous without snow on them; he thought it was dangerous to go down, so he went down carefully, taking hold of the rail; he knew the station well. The defence was that there was no negligence on the part of the defendants, or, if there was, that there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and that the defendants were not liable on the ground that Volenti non fit injuria. The county court judge, after hearing evidence on both sides, found that the accident was caused by the worn and defective state of the steps and by the negligence of the defendants in not clearing away the snow, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. And he held that the maxim Volenti non fit injuria did not apply. He gave judgment for the plaintiff for the agreed sum of £25.

Alfred Young, for the defendants.—The defendants rely on the admissions made by the plaintiff himself in his evidence. The county court judge ought to have held that the accident was solely due to the plaintiff's own conduct. It is clearly a case to which the doctrine Volenti non fit injuria applies; and therefore the defendants are entitled to judgment: Thomas v. Quartermaine, 35 W. R. 555, 18 Q. B. D. 685.

W. Wills, for the plaintiff.—The question whether the doctrine Volenti non fit injuria applies depends on a a question of fact, which must be taken to have been found in the plaintiff's favour: Yarmouth v. France, ante, p. 281, 19 Q. B. D. 647.

He also referred to Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., 2 Ex. D. 384, 25 W. R. Dig. 155; Crafter v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 14 W. R. 334, L. R. 1 C. P. 300; and Longmore v. Great Western Railway Co., 19 C. B. N. S. 183.

Wills, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. Thomas v. Quartermaine is a case which requires to be very carefully applied. For the present purpose it is sufficient to take that view of it which was taken by Lord Esher, M.R., in Yarmouth v. France. I think that the proper rule to be drawn from the two cases is that, where the defence of Volenti non fit injuria is raised, it is for the defendant to establish affirmatively the facts which are necessary to support that defence—viz., that the plaintiff voluntarily took the risk upon himself, and had a full knowledge of the nature and extent of the danger. It is doubtful whether the learned county court judge took this point into consideration. But it is the defendant that wants a finding of fact to that effect. The plaintiff does not want any finding. The defendant is not entitled, without obtaining any such finding, to come and ask this court to say that the only proper inference to be drawn from the facts proved is that the plaintiff did voluntarily undertake the risk with full knowledge of the danger.

Bill of sale—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31) and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43)—Misdescription of grantor's name in bill of sale—Intent to conceal—Registration.

The Christian name of the grantor of a bill of sale was wrongly described for the purpose of concealing the fact that he had given a bill of sale.

Held, that this did not render the registration of the bill invalid.

Appeal by an execution creditor from the decision of the judge of the county court of Surrey, holden at Lambeth.

This was an interpleader issue between the Consolidated Credit and Mortgage Corporation (Limited), claiming certain goods as grantees under a bill of sale, and one Downs, the execution creditor of the grantor.

The bill of sale purported to be given by "Alfred Salmon and Edith Campbell, wife of Alfred Salmon," whereas the real name of the grantor was George Henry Arthur Salmon. The name of the wife (also a grantee) was correct. The misdescription was effected purposely, as Mr. G. H. A. Salmon was applying for a clerkship in the City, and it would have been prejudicial to him if it were known that he had given a bill of sale. The county court judge held that the misdescription had been wilfully made by both grantors for the above reason, but that there was no evidence that the grantees were aware of the misdescription, or that anyone had been deceived by it, and therefore, on the authority of Ex parte McHattie, In re Wood, 27 W. R. 327, 10 Ch. D. 358, held that the bill of sale was good.

U. E. Jones, for the appellant.—The bill of sale was bad. The name of the husband was wilfully misscribed for the purpose of concealing the bill of sale from any person who might search the register. This case is distinguishable from Ex parte McHattie, In re Wood, for there the bill of sale was executed by the grantor in his name of "Joseph Wood," although he was generally known as "Joseph Albert Wood," and the name was in that case given with sufficient correctness to enable a person to ascertain from the register whether he had or had not given a bill of sale. Foulger v. Taylor, 1 L. T. N. S. 57, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 11, and Luckin v. Bailey, 18 W. R. 43, are also in point.

Jelf, Q.C., and W. H. Clay, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Field, J.—It is quite plain that in this case the grantors of a bill of sale, a man and his wife, committed a deliberate fraud upon the Act of Parliament by deliberately intending to deceive the public. It is collateral that their motive was that which was stated in evidence—viz., the husband was applying for a clerkship in the City, and it would have prejudiced him if it were known that he had given a bill of sale. There is no evidence that the execution creditor was misled by the misdescription, nor is it alleged that he did not know the description was incorrect. It was objected before the county court judge that the Christian name of the husband was incorrectly given as "Alfred," his true Christian name being "George Henry Arthur," and that his wife was described as "wife of Alfred Salmon." The bill of sale itself was not impeached as being in itself a bad bill of sale, but for not having been duly registered. Does it come under the disabling provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts? Non-compliance with the requirements of section 10, sub-section 2, of 41 & 42 Vict. c. 31 makes the registration bad. This would, by virtue of 5 & 46

Vict. c. 48, s. 8, render the bill of sale void in respect of the personal chattels comprised in it. Then section 10, subsection 2, of the first-mentioned Act requires that a bill of sale, "and also a true copy of such bill, and of every attestation of the execution of such bill, together with an affidavit of the time of such bill of sale being made or given, and of its due execution and attestation, and a description of the residence and occupation of the person making or giving the same . . . . . shall be filed with the registrar within seven days after the making or giving of such bill of sale." This provision might mean that the affidavit should state that the bill of sale was duly executed by the person who in the terms of it professed to be the grantor; but I am of opinion that it would be giving too broad a construction to this provision if we held that it was meant to include a correct statement of the grantor's Christian name. It is also enacted that the affidavit must give a "description of the residence and occupation" of the grantor. The description of Mrs. Salmon as "the wife of Alfred Salmon" clearly did not describe her occupation. With regard to the Christian name of the husband, the Court of Appeal, in Ex parte McHattie, In re Wood, relied on the fact that the Bills of Sale Act, 1854, which was in question in that case, did not require the names of the grantor to be stated on the register, and as the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882, do not require it either, I am of opinion that the decision of the county court judge was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Reg. v. Sir James Ingham (a.)

Revenue—Excise—Jurisdiction of magistrate to hear information—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 15), s. 4.

An information for the recovery of an excise penalty under section 4 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1887, may be preferred before a metropolitan police magistrate for an offence committed within his jurisdiction by virtue of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 61.

Order nisi for a mandamus calling on a metropolitan police magistrate (Sir James Ingham) to show cause why he should not hear and determine the matter of an information exhibited by order of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue against one Adams, a tobacconist, for the recovery of an excise penalty under 50 & 51 Vict. c. 15, s. 4.

By that section it is enacted that, "If any manufacturer of tobacco shall have in his custody or possession any tobacco (except tobacco which must undergo some process of treatment or manufacture before it is fit for sale), or if any dealer in or retailer of tobacco shall have in his custody or possession any tobacco, and such tobacco shall in either case on being dried at a temperature of 212° Fahr. be decreased in weight by more than thirty-five per cent., he shall incur an excise penalty of £50; and the tobacco shall be forfeited."

The learned magistrate doubted whether he had jurisdiction, and refused to hear the information in order that the question as to jurisdiction might be decided on appeal.

Mead showed cause.

Sir H. Clarke, S.G., and Danckwerts, in support of the rule, were not called upon.

Field, J.—An objection to the hearing of this information was raised on the ground that, though a new offence was created by the Act 50 & 51 Vict. c. 15, under section 4 of which the information was laid, no provision was made for the recovery of the penalty; and that the learned magistrate had no jurisdiction. On the other hand it was contended that jurisdiction was conferred by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 61, an Act relating to summary proceedings for penalties under the Acts relating to the excise, together with the creation of the offence in 50 & 51 Vict. c. 15, by which the amount of penalty for its commission is provided; and it is clear, therefore, that the Legislature understood there was a mode by which the penalty could be enforced. That mode is provided by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 61, which confers on the metropolitan police magistrates a concurrent jurisdiction with the Commissioners of Inland Revenue within the limits of the chief office of Inland Revenue in London, "for the recovery of any penalty imposed by any Act or Acts relating to the revenue of excise and incurred for or by reason of any offence committed against such Act or Acts." It is contended for the Crown that these words confer jurisdiction on Sir James Ingham to hear and determine this information, and I am of that opinion. The word "imposed" is not limited to any particular time or to the previous Acts. The Consolidation Excise Act (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53), recited as the foundation of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 61, where the words "imposed or to be imposed" are used in section 2, was relied upon by the counsel showing cause as a reason for limiting the word "imposed" in the later Act, but it is only an instance where the Legislature has used, as is often the case, language of larger import, and does not induce me to construe the words of the later Act in a more restricted sense.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. The argument in support of this order rests upon the narrowest construction of the word "imposed." It is said that the words "to be imposed" would have to be used in order to include offences under future Acts, but as in the line following the past participle is employed in the word "committed," and the word "imposed" is placed in close contiguity to a word which must be used in the wider sense, this argument cannot be maintained. The present case is not like that class of case where new rights are created or old rights restricted, and to which a rule of strict construction is applicable to a statute, but it is a modification of the older law and is in favour of the subject.

the High Court against the defendant Coulson, on whose application it was remitted to the county court of Middlesex under section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867. The county court judge gave the plaintiff leave to add one Ferdinand Strausberg as a defendant, and ultimately gave judgment against both defendants. Strausberg then obtained from the judge at chambers an order for a prohibition prohibiting all further proceedings against him under the judgment, and this order was affirmed on appeal by the Divisional Court (ante, p. 524). The plaintiff, having given notice of appeal to the Court of Appeal, applied ex parte to a master at chambers, and obtained an order admitting him to proceed in formâ pauperis. On the application of Strausberg the master rescinded this ex parte order. The plaintiff then appealed to Denman, J., who referred the matter to the court.

Overend, for the plaintiff.

G. S. Bower, for Strausberg.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that there is no power to admit this appellant to appeal in formâ pauperis from the order of the Divisional Court granting a prohibition. It being admitted that no precedent could be found before the Rules of 1883, the question must depend on whether the case comes within ord. 16, r. 22. But the effect of ord. 68, rr. 1, 2, is that order 16 does not apply to proceedings on the Crown Side of the Queen's Bench Division. Neither do the Crown Office Rules contain any provision for appealing in formâ pauperis. Therefore I am of opinion that the order rescinding the ex parte order was right.

"THE FLYING SERPENT" AND "THE NIOBE." (a.)

Ship—Damage—Tug and tow—Liability of tow for negligence of tug.

A steam-tug towing a ship at sea with a long scope of hawser came into collision at night with another ship, whose owners instituted an action of damage against both the steam-tug and the ship she had had in tow, and therein claimed to recover the damage sustained in the collision. The statement of claim alleged that the owners of the steam-tug had admitted their liability for the collision, and had obtained an order limiting the amount of such liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts. At the hearing the court found as a fact that there had been a bad look-out on the steam-tug; that the ship she had come into collision with had kept her course; and that the ship in tow had contributed to the collision by a bad look-out, and by not porting her helm and checking the course of the steam-tug.

Held, that the ship in tow was liable for the damages proceeded for in the action.

*Quære, if, as matter of law, the tow would not have been equally liable even if those on board her had not by any negligent act of theirs in fact contributed to the collision.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the ship Valetta and her cargo against the ship Niobe and her freight, and against the steam-tug Flying Serpent and her freight.

The action was brought to recover the damage sustained by The Valetta on the 23rd of March, 1887, when The Flying Serpent, having The Niobe in tow, came into collision with The Valetta in St. George's Channel, off the South Tuskar Light, and caused her to sink, together with her cargo.

The statement of claim alleged that The Valetta had kept her course until a collision appeared to be inevitable; that at the time of the collision The Flying Serpent was under engagement with the owners of The Niobe to tow her to Cardiff, and those on board The Flying Serpent were the servants of the owners of The Niobe, and were subject to the control and orders of those on board The Niobe, and that the owners of The Flying Serpent had admitted their liability for the collision, and obtained an order limiting their liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts. The statement of claim further imputed blame to those on board The Flying Serpent and The Niobe for not keeping a good look-out, and for not keeping out of the way of The Valetta, and also charged those on board The Niobe with having neglected to give proper orders to The Flying Serpent to keep herself and The Niobe out of the way of The Valetta.

The defendants, the owners of The Niobe, alleged in the defence that at the time of the loss of The Valetta they had entered into a contract of towage with the owners of The Flying Serpent for those on board that vessel to have the control over the towage and course of the two vessels; that on the 22nd of March, 1887, The Niobe left Greenock in tow of The Flying Serpent, with a scope of ninety fathom of hawser between the two vessels, and from that time until the collision therein mentioned The Flying Serpent had the control of the towage and course of the two vessels; that The Flying Serpent neglected to keep out of the way of The Valetta, and came into collision with her, doing her so much damage that she sank, whilst The Niobe slightly touched the quarter of The Valetta without doing her any damage; and that the defendants denied that those on board The Flying Serpent were the servants of the owners of The Niobe, or subject to the orders or control of those on board The Niobe, or in such a position that those on board The Niobe could exercise any control or give any orders to The Flying Serpent, and submitted that those on board The Niobe were not guilty of negligence, and were in no way liable for the negligence of The Flying Serpent, or those on board her, such persons being independent contractors, over whom the defendants had no control.

Feb. 15.—The action was now heard before the President, assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 21.—HANNEN, P.—The collision which was the subject of inquiry in this case occurred on the night of the 23rd of March, 1887, between the sailing vessel Valetta and the steam-tug Flying Serpent, whilst the latter was engaged in towing the ship Niobe from Greenock to Cardiff. The Valetta was sailing on a course N.E. by E., with a N.W. wind, at a rate of seven and a half knots, with her side lights burning brightly, when the look-out saw the two masthead lights of The Flying Serpent at a distance estimated at three miles, and about three points on The Valetta's port bow. The green light of the tug and her tow soon after came in view. The Valetta kept her course, but The Flying Serpent continued to approach The Valetta until, with her stem and starboard bow, she struck The Valetta's port bow, causing such damage that The Valetta shortly afterwards sank, and two of her crew were drowned.

For The Niobe it was contended that the collision was caused solely by the negligence of The Flying Serpent, and that she, The Niobe, is not responsible for the conduct of the tug. I shall first consider whether there was any negligence on the part of The Niobe; and, secondly, whether that negligence, if it existed, contributed to the collision.

The Flying Serpent and her tow were on a S.S.W. course and had The Valetta on their starboard bows, while The Valetta, sailing on a converging course of N.E. by E. had the tug and tow on her port bow. There can be no doubt that there was a defective look-out on The Flying Serpent, and that she consequently took no step to keep out of the way of The Valetta. Let us see what was the state of things on board of The Niobe.

The Flying Serpent was towing The Niobe with a scope of hawser of about 100 fathoms. The look-out man on The Niobe says that he first saw a dim, bright light on The Valetta two points on the port bow at about four ships' lengths off. This, then, must have been when The Flying Serpent was close to The Valetta. The white light which the look-out man saw was, as the captain of The Niobe conjectures, probably a companion or binnacle light. The look-out man reported this light, and immediately afterwards saw the loom of The Valetta's sails, and then the red light; but before he had time to report it he heard the crash of the collision, which he says took place immediately after he saw the sails. Later on he stated he only saw the red light after he heard the crash, and finally he said he almost "saw the lot at once." This evidence seems to show very cleary that there was a bad look-out on The Niobe.

The evidence of the captain of The Niobe does not materially alter that of the look-out. The captain "was below when he heard the report of a light." He immediately came on deck and saw a white light two or three points on the starboard bow at a distance which he cannot estimate; he immediately ordered the helm hard-a-port. He did not hear the crash or know when the tow rope was cast off, but he thinks seven or eight minutes elapsed from giving the order hard-a-port till The Niobe struck The Valetta, or after the tug struck her. Seven or eight minutes is probably more time than passed between the order hard-a-port and the collision of The Niobe with The Valetta. But this question of time is not material, as I think that all that could be done was done when the light of The Valetta was seen, but I consider that it ought to have been seen sooner.

The next question is, Whether this negligence of The Niobe contributed to the collision between The Flying Serpent and The Valetta?

On this, I think the evidence of the captain of The Niobe decisive. He says that if he saw his tug taking a wrong course he certainly should endeavour to control the tug. If he saw the tug taking a direction leading to danger he should apprise her of it, and that he should do by altering his own course, and this would be an effectual mode of doing it. That if he had seen the red light of The Valetta sooner he should have ported sooner, but that he should let the tug get within a mile—about a mile—before he should have thought it necessary to port, and that, as it was, his porting was so late that the tug could not take the hint.

If he had seen the red light at half a mile he could have "girted" the tug—that is, he could have checked her by shearing to the right under a port helm. "Girting" the tug, he says, is a common manœuvre.

I have put the question to the Trinity Brethren whether, if the red light of The Valetta had been sooner seen by those on board The Niobe she could, by porting her helm, have checked the course of the tug, and have prevented the collision between the tug and The Valetta. I am advised that she could, and that that would have been the proper seamanlike manner to adopt in the circumstances. And as I find as a fact that there was nothing to prevent the red light of The Valetta being seen at the regulation distance, it follows that the bad look-out of The Niobe contributed to the collision. I am further advised that if The Valetta had been seen sooner The Niobe ought to have signalled by lights to her tug that she was moving into danger. And to the objection that this might have distracted the attention of those on the tug from looking ahead, the answer is, that The Niobe would have had no right to assume that there would not be a sufficient look-out on the tug to look forward as well as astern.

Taking this view of the facts, I doubt if the questions of law which have been discussed before me arise upon this occasion, but I will shortly state my opinion upon the points raised. It was contended that the relation of the tug-owner to the tow-owner is that of an independent contractor, and therefore that the principle of the case of Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499, is applicable, and the tow-owner and his vessel are not responsible for the negligence of the tug-owner and his servants. The basis of the decision in Quarman v. Burnett is that the hirer of horses with a driver from a jobmaster has not, under ordinary circumstances, the management of the horses; but Parke, B., says:—"It is undoubtedly true that there may be special circumstances which may render the hirer of job horses and servants responsible for the neglect of a servant, though not liable by virtue of the general relation of master and servant. He may become so by his own conduct, as by taking the actual management of the horses, or ordering the servant to drive in a particular manner which occasions the damage complained of, or to absent himself at one particular moment, and the like." But it appears to me that the authorities clearly establish that the tow has, under the ordinary contract of towage, control over the tug. The tug and tow are engaged in a common undertaking of which the general management and command belongs to the tow, and in order that she should efficiently execute this command it is necessary that she should have a good look-out, and should not merely allow herself to be drawn, or the tug to go, in a course which will cause damage to another vessel. As Dr. Lushington has pointed out, it is essential to the safety of vessels being towed that there should not be a divided command, and convenience has established that the undivided authority shall belong to the tow. The pilot, if there be one, takes his station on his tow, and the officers of the tow are usually, as in the present case, of a higher class and better able to direct the navigation than those of the tug. The practice which experience has dictated has received the sanction of many legal decisions, and has been recognized in the House of Lords in Spaight v. Tedcastle, where Lord Blackburn says that it is the duty of the tug to carry out the directions received from the ship, and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in The American and The Syria, although in the latter case it was held from the special circumstances that the command belonged to the tug and not to the tow. I may observe that it is clear from the evidence in this case that it was perfectly well understood by the captains of the tug and tow that the latter had the control of their movements, and that it was the duty of those navigating the tow to keep a look-out and check the tug if it were going wrong. It was argued, however, that whatever the relation of the tug and tow may generally be, they were reversed in this case by special circumstances; first, by the contract of towage between the parties, but there is nothing in the contract of towage but a bare agreement to tow; secondly, by the fact that the towage was at sea with a long scope of hawser, and that this gives rise to different duties on the part of the two vessels to those which exist on a river towage with a shorter scope of cable. I agree that in a towage at sea with a long scope of hawser it is more difficult for the tow to communicate with the tug.

If it had been shown that The Flying Serpent had, by some sudden manœuvre, which those on board The Niobe could not control, brought about the collision, I myself should have considered that The Niobe had been guilty of no negligence. In The Stormcock I held the tug to be responsible, because the tug, which was originally steering a safe course, suddenly departed from it that the tow could not check her or follow without striking another vessel, and I think that the same result would follow in a river towage in like circumstances. But in the present case the action of The Flying Serpent was not sudden, and might have been prevented by those on board The Niobe if they had done their duty. Lastly, it was contended that The Niobe was not liable because the damage sustained by The Valetta was not done by contact with her. I am of opinion that this is immaterial where, as I find in this case to be the fact, the collision between the tug and the plaintiffs vessel might have been avoided but for the contributory negligence of the tow.

"THE ARGENTINO." (a.)

Damage—Loss of beneficial agreement to collect and carry cargo—Registrar and merchants.

Where a ship is prevented by a collision from fulfilling a beneficial agreement to collect cargo and carry it on a specified voyage, the loss of any definite advantage which, but for the collision, would have arisen from such agreement is to be taken into account in estimating the damages sustained by the shipowner in consequence of the collision.

This was a petition in objection to the report of the registrar in consolidated actions of damage instituted respectively on behalf of the owners of the steamship Gracie against the steamship Argentino, and on behalf of the owners of The Argentino against The Gracie.

The report of the registrar and the schedules annexed thereto stated (inter alia) as follows:—Whereas the damages sustained by the plaintiffs and defendants by reason of the collision in question in these consolidated action have, by consent of parties, been duly referred to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to assess the amount thereof upon the basis of both vessels being to blame for the said collision, . . . I find that the plaintiffs and defendants respectively have sustained loss or damage by reason of the said collision to the extent stated in the schedules 1 and 2 hereto annexed. . . . The collision in this case, between The Argentino and The Gracie, took place in the Thames on the 7th of February, 1887. It was agreed between the parties that both ships were to blame, and that the damage sustained by each respectively should be investigated by the registrar and merchants. No difficulty exists in respect of the damage sustained by The Gracie, but the owners of The Argentino advance a claim for special damages, "item No. 16 in schedule 1," under the following circumstances:—Messrs. Westcott & Laurence are shipbrokers in London who collect cargo at Antwerp and London for conveyance to the Black Sea by two different routes, and the vessels employed for each voyage call at different specified ports on the way, one route or round ending at Batoum, the other at Odessa. About a week or ten days previous to the collision above mentioned, when The Argentino was at sea on a voyage from Sebastopol with a cargo of wheat for London, Mr. Westcott, a partner in the above-named firm, called at the office of Mr. Porteous, the managing owner of The Argentino, and inquired if he had a boat to load for the Batoum route, and being informed of the expected arrival of The Argentino, it was verbally arranged that The Argentino, as soon as she arrived, discharged her cargo, and could be ready, should proceed to Antwerp to load for the Batoum route. Later on, after The Argentino had arrived in the Thames and had collided with The Gracie, and in consequence needed repairs which would take some considerable time, it was arranged between Mr. Westcott and Mr. Porteous that Mr. Westcott should engage another vessel in lieu of The Argentino for the contemplated voyage to Batoum, and accordingly Mr. Westcott did engage the ship Beta, which loaded at Antwerp and in London, and made the same round to Batoum which it was intended The Argentino should make.

The Beta commenced this round by leaving London for Antwerp on the 7th of March, and after loading some cargo there returned to London for further cargo and finally sailed from the Thames about the 20th of March.

The repairs to The Argentino were finished on the 18th of March, and a few days before that date Mr. Westcott proposed to Mr. Porteous to load The Argentino for the Odessa route, an offer which Mr. Porteous accepted; and accordingly, on the 19th or 20th of March the ship left London for Antwerp where she loaded about 260 tons, sailed thence for London on the 27th, where she loaded 1,000 tons more, and finally sailed from London on the Odessa route on the 10th of April. The result of the voyages of The Beta and The Argentino respectively seems to be that The Beta earned a gross freight on the Batoum round of £1,536, The Argentino a gross freight of £1,[illegible], showing a difference of £155, which sum [illegible] a loss or damage arising from the collision. It [illegible] further said that had The Argentino made the same round as The Beta did, she would have loaded [illegible] cargo, and, being a larger vessel, would have [illegible]quently earned a larger gross freight than The Beta, £93, which is claimed as a further loss resulting from the collision. Then, again, The Argentino [illegible] days longer loading than The Beta, which is [illegible] to her cargo not being equally ready for [illegible] The Beta's, eight days of demurrage of the ship claimed at the extravagant rate of £89 11s. 2d. per day, equal to £837 13s. 4d., thus making a total claim for consequential damages under the head of £785 12s. 4d. I am of opinion that the claim is too remote, and cannot be sustained. It seems to me that there is a broad distinction between this case and that of The Star of India, 25 W. R. 377, 1 P. D. 466, where the late judge of the Admiralty Court held that in estimating damages arising from a collision the loss of a beneficial charter-party under which the ship would have earned a specific amount of freight must be considered. The circumstances of that case were very different from those of the present case. In this case there was a mere verbal arrangement to allow The Argentino to load for the Batoum route in the usual way without any promise of a full cargo or guarantee as to the rate of freight. The shipowner had to take these risks. The arrangement had not the force and the effect of a definite charter-party, under which a specific amount of gross freight is contracted for. Then the substituted arrangement under which The Argentino went on the Odessa round was voluntarily made on the expectation, which both parties entertained, that it would prove as favourable in its results as the first arrangement for the Batoum round.

Mr. Porteous admitted that he took his chance as to the quantity of cargo the ship would get, and as to the rate of freight, and that he accepted the second offer because Mr. Westcott led him to think the ship would do as well with it. There is no evidence before us that The Argentino could not have got employment as profitable as The Beta's from other brokers or other directions, if it had been sought or inquired for, and it appears to me that because, in the result, the employment the owner accepted for his ship accidently proved to be less favourable than he was led to anticipate, and probably less favourable than if she had sailed on the Batoum route as originally intended, he is not thereby entitled to claim compensation for his disappointed expectations as if they were the necessary result of the collision. . . .

Sir W. Phillimore, Q.C., and Boyd, for the owners of the Argentino in objection to the report of the registrar.—In consequence of the collision the owners of The Argentino have lost the profit they would have made under their contract with Messrs. Westcott & Laurence. They are therefore clearly entitled to have the loss they so sustained taken into consideration in the assessment of the damages: The Star of India; The Consett, 5 P. D. 229.

Finlay, Q.C., and Nelson, for the owners of The Gracie.—There was no contract that the owners of The Argentino should receive any profit from The Argentino taking her turn at Messrs. Westcott & Laurence's wharf. The transaction was merely speculative, and the registrar has rightly come to the conclusion that the expectation of receiving a benefit from placing their vessel at Messrs. Westcott & Laurence's disposal is too remote to be considered as an element in assessing the damages in this case: The Parana, 25 W. R. 596, 2 P. D. 118; The Notting Hill, 32 W. R. 764, 9 P. D. 105; The Clarence, 3 W. Rob. 263.

Feb. 14.—Hannen, P.—The Argentino came into collision with a vessel called The Gracie, and it was agreed that both vessels should be held to blame. No question arose as to the damages which the owners of The Gracie were entitled to recover, but a question arose as to those which the owners of The Argentino were entitled to recover. It appears that shortly before the collision an arrangement—I use a neutral expression—was come to between the owners of The Argentino and the firm of Messrs. Westcott & Laurence, shipbrokers, of London, that The Argentino should take its place on a line of vessels which Messrs. Westcott & Laurence were in the habit of employing for the purpose of carrying cargo from their customers to ports in the Black Sea. The Argentino, in consequence of the collision, was under repair for a considerable time, and was unable to take her place in that line so as to earn the freight which she would have earned if she had gone on the voyage. When it was seen that it was impossible that she could take that place, Messrs. Westcott & Laurence engaged another ship called The Beta, which accordingly collected freight in London and in Antwerp, and proceeded on the voyage which The Argentino would have taken but for the accident, or unless some other event had intervened. It was claimed on the part of The Argentino that her owners were entitled to compensation for loss of the advantages which they would have derived from the arrangement made with Messrs. Westcott & Laurence. The learned registrar, assisted by merchants, has found that The Argentino was not entitled to make that claim, it being considered by them that the damage so claimed was too remote. The learned registrar says, with regard to what I have called an arrangement, that "it was verbally arranged that The Argentino, as soon as she arrived, discharged her cargo, and could be ready, should proceed to Antwerp to load for the Batoum route," and he says, at a later part of the report, "in this case there was a mere verbal arrangement to allow The Argentino to load for the Batoum route in the usual way, without any promise of a full cargo or guarantee as to the rate of freight." Now it was argued that the learned registrar based his judgment upon the fact that it was a mere verbal arrangement as distinguished from a written agreement. I doubt that that was in the mind of the learned registrar. I think he more probably insisted on the agreement being verbal in this sense—namely, that it did not lead him to the conclusion that it was a binding arrangement, and if I agreed with him in that which I take to be his finding, I should have nothing to say against his report, but I am of opinion that that is not a true view of the facts. It appears that Messrs. Westcott & Laurence were in the habit of collecting from their customers goods which they sent to the Black Sea, and that they have certain rates of freight for so doing, their profit being obtained by a commission upon these freights. This course of business was perfectly well known to both parties, for it appears that The Argentino herself had been employed upon these lines, and the probability of a remunerative employment of The Argentino was thus in the contemplation of both parties. The contract, therefore, in fact, was that in consideration that Mr. Porteous supplied The Argentino to carry the cargo collected by Messrs. Westcott & Laurence, Porteous allowed that vessel to collect that cargo and carry it on the advertised voyage. That was a binding agreement. If, for instance, The Argentino had not been ready, and Messrs. Westcott & Laurence had been obliged to engage another vessel, they would have had a ground of action against The Argentino for any loss they had sustained. What leads me strongly to the opinion that what took place was not a mere negotiation is that The Argentino was, to the knowledge of her owners, advertised to load and sail after The Rome, and it was as sure as anything in business can be that The Argentino, except for some accident, would reap the benefit of this contract. The registrar, in his report, states that he was referred to the case of The Star of India, in which the loss sustained by the inability to fulfil a certain charter-party was allowed by the late judge of the Admiralty Court to be taken into consideration in estimating the amount of damages resulting from a collision. But the registrar distinguishes that case from the present on the ground that the arrangement in the present case was a mere verbal agreement to allow The Argentino to load for the Batoum route in the usual way, without any promise of a full cargo or a guaranteed rate of freight. The arrangement, the registrar says, had not the full force or effect of a definite charter-party under which a specific rate of gross freight was contracted for. It is there that I differ from him. There is nothing special in the fact that the advantage is to be derived from a definite charter-party. It is sufficient if there is something which leads to a definite assurance that some benefit will be derived, whether it be from a charter-party or any other agreement not a charter-party. The case of The Star of India was followed in the case of The Conseil, in which Sir Robert Phillimore equally allowed loss from inability to fulfil a charter-party. I also find an earlier case, in which the principle upon which the court proceeds is clearly laid down. It is the case of The Clarence. There Dr. Lushington said:—"It does not follow as a matter of necessity that anything is due for the detention of a vessel whilst under repair. Under some circumstances, undoubtedly, such a consequence will follow, as, for example, where a fishing voyage is lost, or where the vessel would have been beneficially employed. The onus of proving her loss rests with the plaintiff, and this onus has not been discharged on the present occasion. Had the owners of The Clarence proved that the vessel would have earned freight, and that such freight was lost by the collision, the case would have fallen within the principle to which I have last adverted. I therefore pronounce against the objection, and confirm the report, with costs." In the present case I am of opinion that the owners of The Argentino have proved that their vessel would have earned freight, and that such freight was lost by the collision. The nature of the advantage which she has lost is, indeed, not as clear as it would have been under a charter-party. At the same time its character is clear, though the amount is uncertain. The Argentino was entitled to take her turn as publicly advertised, and to receive for carriage such cargo as had been collected for that voyage by Messrs. Wescott & Laurence. The rate of freight was fixed. The only thing that remained in uncertainty was whether or not there would be a full cargo, though the contract was entered into in the expectation that there would be a full cargo. I am of opinion, therefore, that it can be held that a definite advantage, which would have been derived from the arrangement with Messrs. Westcott & Laurence, was prevented by the collision from being attained by the owners of the The Argentino, and that, therefore, the loss ought to be taken into account in estimating the damages they have suffered. It was sought, in argument, to liken this to the case of The Parana, where it was held that loss of market could not be allowed, but Mellish, L.J., clearly pointed out the reason for that decision—viz., that the loss of a market is purely speculative. I think that there is nothing speculative about the loss in the present case, its nature is defined, and its amount is ascertainable. I am, therefore, of opinion that the amount of damages allowed to the owners of The Argentino is not sufficient, and that the amount which The Argentino has really lost must be ascertained. It does not follow that damages for the detention of a vessel should necessarily be allowed, but it is usually assumed that a vessel will find employment. Primâ facie, The Argentino lost all the profit she would have gained if she had been allowed to take her turn as arranged, but she is not on that account entitled to remain idle, and she will only be allowed such damages as would result from her being obliged to be employed in some less remunerative way than she would have been employed in under her original contract. It is said by the registrar that there was no evidence before us that The Argentino could not have got employment as profitable as The Beta's from brokers in other directions if it had been sought for. If the registrar and merchants, from evidence before them or from their own great and special knowledge of these matters, had been able to say that The Argentino was not properly employed in going on the Odessa route, I should not have dissented from this view, but I think it is incorrect to say that The Argentino was bound to show that she could not have got employment as profitable as The Beta's from other brokers. The question is, Whether there was anything to show that this substituted voyage, entered into in good faith, was not the best thing under the circumstances? If it was, then the difference between the advantage derived from the two voyages must be taken as a natural result of the impossibility of fulfilling the contract.

Therefore, I think that this case must go back to the registrar to ascertain the amount of loss which the owners of The Argentino suffered from their vessel not being able to fulfil her contract. In this particular case there was another voyage which lasted about the same time as the voyage to Batoum would have taken, and so it naturally presents itself as a subject of comparison. Great difficulties might have arisen had The Argentino been employed on a totally different service on a voyage which might have lasted a very much longer or shorter time, but as it is there is an easy means of ascertaining the loss sustained by The Argentino. It is said that the cargo was, in fact, laden more expeditiously on The Beta than on The Argentino by eight days, and damages are therefore asked for specifically on that head. But I am of opinion that this cannot be treated as a specific amount of damage, though it must be taken into consideration. It will depend whether, in the employment of a vessel in the ordinary way, eight days' demurrage is an extraordinary length of time, if it was, and if the owners of The Argentino entered into a contract which enabled them to be detained for an unreasonable number of days, that loss must not fall on the owners of The Gracie. But if eight days or any other number of days is a reasonable amount of demurrage, and is usually contemplated in loading a vessel of the class of The Argentino, then that must be taken into consideration in estimating the damages in this case. As to the capacity of The Argentino, it appears she was larger than The Beta. If the facts are as alleged she would have obtained a cargo greater in quantity than that The Beta carried. The difference would be part of the loss sustained by the collision. I must, in the result, remit the report to the registrar for reconsideration on the principles which I have laid down.

HUGHES v. ANDERSON. (a.)

Joint tenancy—Severance—Marriage—Wife's chose in action.

Marriage does not operate as a severance of the wife's joint tenancy in a chose in action (bank stock) which has not been reduced into possession by the husband.

Baillie v. Treharne, 29 W. R. 729, 17 Ch. D. 388, disapproved.

The question in this case was whether the joint tenancy in a chose in action had been severed by the marriage of one of the joint tenants (a woman), the chose in action not having been reduced into possession by the husband.

By his will, made in February, 1865, W. H. Butler, who died on the 11th of October, 1865, bequeathed to his executors, one of whom was his wife, certain leasehold property, furniture, policy moneys, and all other property belonging to him at his death, upon trust to pay his debts, and he directed that the residue should be appropriated to the support of his widow and her two children, a son and a daughter.

The testator left no real estate, and the residue of his personal estate, amounting to £849, was, in 1867, invested in the purchase, in the names of the surviving executors, John Gibbs and Elizabeth Butler (the testator's widow), of £311 18*s.* 9d. bank stock.

In 1868 Elizabeth Butler was married to her present husband, D. G. Anderson. The testator left two children, Bessie Alice, who died in 1879 an infant and unmarried, and William Henry, who died in 1886, having attained twenty-one, and leaving a widow and one child, an infant.

In July, 1887, the bank stock was transferred into the names of Mrs. Anderson and the plaintiffs, Hughes and Colcutt, who had been appointed new trustees of the will. D. G. Anderson was not a party to any transfer or sale of the property, and never interfered with it in any way whatever.

On the 31st of October, 1887, an originating summons was taken out by Hughes and Colcutt against Mr. and Mrs. Anderson and the widow and infant child of William Henry Butler the son, raising the question whether Mrs. Anderson was absolutely entitled to the testator's residuary estate.

North, J., held that the widow and the two children of the testator became on his death entitled to the residue of his estate as joint tenants, but (following Baillie v. Treharne, 29 W. R. 729, 17 Ch. D. 388) that the marriage of the widow with Anderson in 1868 severed the joint tenancy, and that she thereupon became absolutely entitled to one-third of the residuary estate, and that the legal personal representative of the testator's son, William Henry Butler, the survivor of the two children, was entitled to the remaining two-thirds.

From this decision Mr. and Mrs. Anderson appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Marcy, for the appellants.

Cookson-Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Theobald, for the respondents.

The arguments and the cases cited sufficiently appear from the judgments.

COTTON, L.J.—This appeal raises a nice point which, except for the case of Baillie v. Treharne, has now come for the first time for decision. The question is whether, when a woman entitled to an equitable interest as joint tenant in a chose in action marries, the marriage by itself is a severance of the joint tenancy.

We must go back to the old authorities, which lay down the principle upon which the question must be solved.

Lord Coke says (Co. Litt. 185b):—"Two femes, joyntenants of a lease for yeares, one of them taketh husband and dieth, yet the terme shall survive; for though all chattells real are given to the husband if he survive, yet the survivor between the joyntenants is the elder title, and after the marriage the feme continued sole possessed; for if the husband dyeth the feme shall have it and not the executors of the husband. But otherwise it is of personall goods."

It is said that the words "personal goods" were used by Lord Coke in the widest possible sense, as including all personal property whatsoever. But there is another passage (p. 351a) which shows that Lord Coke did not use the words in that sense:—"But chattels real being of a mixt nature—viz., partly in possession and partly in action, which happen during the coverture—the husband shall have by the intermarriage if hee survive his wife, albeit he reduceth them not into possession in her lifetime; but if the wife surviveth him she shall have them. As if the husband be seised of a rent service, charge, or seck, in the right of his wife, the rent become due during the coverture, the wife dieth, the husband shall have the arerages; but if the wife survive the husband she shall have them, and not the executors of the husband."

Then follows the passage which shows that in the previous passage he meant by "personal goods" property passing by delivery. He proceeds (p. 351b):—"But the marriage is an absolute gift of all chattels personal in possession in her owne right, whether the husband survive the wife or no; but if they be in action, as debts by obligation, contract, or otherwise, the husband shall not have them unlesse he and his wife recover them." That seems to lay down a principle which has been acted upon in later cases.

In In re Barton's Will, 10 Hare, 12, Turner, V.C., after referring to the passage which I have read from Co. Litt. (p. 185b.), proceeds:—"The authority referred to by Lord Coke is the case of Bracebridge v. Cook, Plowd. 418. In that case, after stating that if a woman having a term of years takes a husband, the husband cannot devise the term to another by his will; for the wife at the time of the death and before the death had the estate in her, which will prevent and frustrate the devise, . . . but otherwise it is of chattels personal; for if a woman who has personal goods takes a husband, the law divests the property out of the wife and vests it in the husband only; and so it is if a stranger gives personal goods to a feme covert and to a stranger, the jointure is presently severed by the law so that the survivor of the wife or of the other shall not have the whole, but the husband and the other are tenants in common presently, and the title of such of them as first dies shall go to the executors." He means that the joint tenancy is severed in the goods because in the chattels there referred to the husband has, by force of his position, the right to take them, and by taking them to divest the property out of the wife. Then the passage goes on:—"For chattels personal are esteemed in law of less value and are of a baser degree than chattels real, and so there is a diversity between them; and it is added that, the case being one of a chattel real, the coverture of the wife makes no severance of the jointure, nor is it any impediment to the plaintiff having the whole as survivor." So far the Vice-Chancellor has been dealing with the case of Bracebridge v. Cook, and he proceeds:—"Thus it appears that, in the case of chattels real, the joint tenancy is not severed by the marriage, because the property does not vest in the husband; but in the case of chattels personal it is severed by the marriage, because the property does vest in her." The report says "her," but that is obviously a mistake for "him." "In the present case," continues the Vice-Chancellor, "the property was a mere chattel personal, but the wife's interest was reversionary, and therefore the title of the husband or his assigns could not arise till after the death of the wife in his lifetime. The case, therefore, seems to me to fall within the principle of the rule which applies to chattels real, and not of the rule which applies to chattels personal; and consequently the joint tenancy was not severed by the marriage, but continued till the death of the wife."

It is clear that by "chattels personal" the Vice-Chancellor meant chattels passing by delivery. A wife's chose in action does not vest in the husband by marriage, and it would be a strange thing if marriage in respect of such property were to have any greater effect than it would as regards a wife's undivided moiety in a term or chattel real. As regards the latter the husband can at once execute a deed which will have the effect of severing the joint tenancy, but he cannot do that in regard to her choses in action. I do not see, therefore, why marriage should sever the wife's joint tenancy in a chose in action while it does not do so in her chattels real. We were referred to a passage in the judgment of James, V.C., in Armstrong v. Armstrong, 17 W. R. 571, L. R. 7 Eq., at p. 522, which would look as if that learned judge considered that a chose in action in possession was to be considered as personal goods within the meaning of the passage in Co. Litt. He does not take the point which we now have to decide, because it was not necessary for his purpose, the chose in action there being reversionary, "which the husband could not have reduced into possession during the coverture"; but I take it that he did not intend to apply to a chose in action, which is not reversionary, the term "chattel personal in possession" in the sense in which that term is used as meaning a chattel which, by the mere act of marriage, becomes vested in the husband. The only case in favour of the respondent's view is Baillie v. Treharne, and there Malins, V.C., undoubtedly does express a view which is contrary to what I consider to be the true one. He says, "A joint tenancy can always be severed by assignment, and that may be done either by deed or by operation of law, as on marriage, by which the personal property of the wife is given to the husband as much as if it was assigned by deed." That, no doubt, is the case with regard to personal goods which are capable of being taken into manual possession. But, as regards the wife's choses in action, it is wrong to say that marriage has the same effect of assigning them to the husband as a deed executed by the wife before marriage would have had. On the marriage the husband acquires the right to reduce her choses in action into possession, or, if they are reversionary, he can reduce them into possession if he be the survivor. But that is a right entirely different from what the husband would get if the wife were to assign such property to him by deed executed before marriage. In my opinion the Vice-Chancellor did not take note of what is the true effect of marriage upon the wife's choses in action, and I must dissent from his decision, which North, J., has followed. The appeal will therefore be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The only intelligible rule is that laid down in Bracebridge v. Cook. In that case a lessee for years granted his estate to a feme covert and another, and the question was whether or no thereby the term remained in jointure, or if the jointure was dissolved by the interest of the husband; and the court held the law to be that, "if a man who has a lease for years grants his term to a feme covert and another, or if a feme covert and another are joint tenants for years, and she takes husband, the jointure is not dissolved, but continues. But otherwise it is of chattels personal; for if a woman who has personal goods takes husband, the law divests the property out of the wife and vests it in the husband only. And so it is if a stranger gives personal goods to a feme covert and another; the jointure is presently severed by the law, so that the whole shall not go to the survivor of the wife and the other, but the husband and the other are tenants in common presently, and the title of such of them as first dies shall go to the executors; for chattels personal are esteemed in law of less value, and are of a baser degree, than chattels real, and so there is a diversity between them. Therefore here, inasmuch as this is a chattel real, the coverture of the wife makes no severance of the jointure." The marriage of a woman does not vest the property in her choses in action in the husband, and therefore, if she is a joint tenant of a chose in action, the marriage does not sever the joint tenancy.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the case of chattels personal, marriage, by process of law, diverts the property in them out of the wife. In the case of chattels real (leaseholds) it does not; the husband acquires a right to make the property his own, but a novus actus interveniens on his part is necessary. In the case of a chose in action marriage does not divest the property out of the wife, and all that the husband acquires by the marriage is a right to reduce the chose in action into possession. The interest of the wife in this case being an interest in a chose in action, the joint tenancy was not severed by the marriage. I will add nothing to what has been said with reference to Baillie v. Treharne.

Held, also, on the evidence, that, on April 2, 1886, the company was, to the knowledge of the directors, in an insolvent state, and that the transaction of that date was invalid as a fraudulent preference within section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862.

Appeal from Kay, J. (reported ante, p. 570, 37 Ch. D. 508).

A summons had been taken out by the liquidator in the winding up of the Land Development Association for the purpose of enforcing payment by Kent, the present appellant, of a call for £811 on shares in respect of which he had been placed on the list of contributories. Kent contended that the shares in question had been fully paid for, and relied on the following transaction as sufficient to support his plea of payment.

In 1885 one Eicholz claimed a large sum of money from the company. In November, 1885, an arrangement was come to between Eicholz and the company, whereby in effect the company acknowledged their indebtedness to Eicholz, and agreed to pay the same in four instalments, of which the first instalment, £3,000, was to become payable on June 30, 1886. Kent agreed with Eicholz to purchase this debt due by the company to Eicholz.

On April 2, 1886, Kent wrote to the directors of the company requesting them to transfer from the amount due in respect of the debt due by the company to Eicholz, and assigned by Eicholz to Kent, a sum sufficient to pay up in full the shares standing in Kent's name. At a board meeting of directors held the same day it was resolved that "the seal of the association be affixed to the assignment from Eicholz to Kent of the association's indebtness to Eicholz as expressed therein," and that "the debt assigned by Eicholz to Kent as aforesaid be applied in paying up in full the shares mentioned in Kent's letter of this date." Except the minutes of these resolutions there was no entry in the books of the company with reference to the transactions, and no contract in writing had been registered under section 25 of the Act of 1867. At the date of these resolutions no call on the shares held by Kent had been made. Article 11 of the articles of association empowered the directors to receive in advance all or any part of the moneys due on shares beyond the sums actually called for on them.

On April 5, 1886, a petition for the winding up of the company was presented by a creditor, and on April 20 a winding-up order was made.

Kay, J., held that there had been nothing equivalent to payment in cash within section 25, and that Kent was therefore liable for the call made.

Kent appealed, and appeared in person.

The arguments and cases relied on by him appear sufficiently from the report below, and are fully dealt with in the judgment.

Marten, Q.C., and Vernon Smith, for the respondent, the liquidator, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kay, J., holding the appellant liable to pay a call of £811 on shares, in respect of which he has been placed on the list of contributories. The appellant contends that this sum must be treated as paid—i.e., that, having regard to the transaction of the 2nd of April, there has been a payment of the amount due on the shares within the principle laid down in Spargo's case, 21 W. R. 306, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 407, and other cases. In Spargo's case—the whole question turning on section 25 of the Act of 1867—James, L.J., says, "It was considered that there was mischief in collateral contracts of that kind which deprived creditors of the remedies they would expect to have against persons whose names they saw registered on the list of shareholders. . . . But if a transaction resulted in this, that there was on the one side a bonâ fide debt payable in money at once for the purchase of property, and on the other side a bonâ fide liability to pay money at once on shares, so that if bank-notes had been handed from one side of the table to the other in payment of calls they might legitimately have been handed back in payment for the property, . . . it appears to me that this Act of Parliament did not make it necessary that the formality should be gone through of the money being handed over and taken back again, but that if the two demands are set off against each other the shares have been paid for in cash. If it comes to this, that there was a debt in money payable immediately by the company to the shareholder, and an equal debt payable immediately by the shareholder to the company, and that each was accepted in full payment of the other, the company could have pleaded payment in an action brought against them, and the shareholder could have pleaded payment in cash in a corresponding action brought by the company against him for calls. Supposing the transaction to be an honest transaction, it would in a court of law be sufficient evidence in support of a plea of payment in cash, and it appears to me that it is sufficient for this court sitting in a winding-up matter." Mellish, L.J., though not using exactly similar terms, must be considered as assenting to the view expressed by James, L.J., for he says, "Nothing is clearer than that, if parties account with each other, and sums are stated to be due on one side and sums to an equal amount due on the other side on that account, and those accounts are settled by both parties, it is exactly the same thing as if the sums due on both sides had been paid." In White's case, 27 W. R. 895, 12 Ch. D. 511, I myself expressed the same view.

We must now apply the principle laid down in these cases to the present case, having regard to section 25 of the Act of 1867.

These shares were standing in Kent's name, and article 11 of the articles of association provided that the directors might receive from any member willing to advance the same all or any of the moneys due upon the share or shares held by him beyond the sums actually called for. On the 2nd of April, 1886, no call had been actually made, but, assuming that on that date there was a debt due by the company to Eicholz, under the arrangement of November, 1885, exceeding the amount of the uncalled liability in respect of Kent's shares, yet under the agreement of November, 1885, the debt due by the company to Eicholz was payable at certain specified times, and no portion of it was payable on the 2nd of April, nor until the 30th of June, 1886. [The Lord Justice then referred to Kent's letter of the 2nd of April, and the resolution passed by the directors on the same day, "That the debt assigned by Eicholz to Kent be applied in paying up in full the shares mentioned in Kent's letter," and continued:—] Can it be said that that transaction of the 2nd of April would in any way support the plea of payment in cash? Both the debt due by the company to Eicholz and the liability of Kent to the company in respect of his shares, on which no call had then been made, were at that date matters in futuro, and the agreement between the company and Kent was in respect of a future thing to be done when those debts became payable.

In my opinion, therefore, the transaction cannot come within the principle laid down by James, L.J., in Spargo's case. As to what was said by Kay, J., that if there had been an entry in the books of the company showing that the debt due by the company to Eicholz had been written off, I think what he meant was that such an entry might have been—not evidence of what had been agreed to, but as constituting, in fact, a new agreement as to payment. However there was no such entry. The case is, therefore, quite distinct from Ferrao's case, 22 W. R. 386, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 355, which has been relied on by Mr. Kent. It is quite true that in Ferrao's case there were no calls actually due, but the court held that the moment the company, in pursuance of the judge's order, made the entry crediting the shares of Ferrao with the £700, that was to be treated as a payment in cash for the amount due on the shares. That case is wholly distinct from the present one. But then the appellant contended that the resolution of April 2 was an agreement that the Eicholz debt should be treated as presently payable, and for payment of the same to the extent of £811. In my opinion the resolution does not amount to an agreement to that effect.

I have also come to the conclusion that, under the circumstances, the transaction would be such as to give Kent, as assignee of Eicholz's debt, a fraudulent preference, and the fact that the debt due to Eicholz was of a larger amount than Kent's liability in respect of calls is utterly immaterial. I think that the company, at the time of the transaction, was not in a position to pay its debts as they became due. A winding-up petition was presented only three days after the date of the transaction referred to, and a winding-up order was made on that petition within three weeks afterwards. We have therefore to consider the effect of section 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and of section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862. [The Lord Justice read these sections, and continued:—] It was said that section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, as to mutual credits and set off, would prevent this transaction from being a fraudulent preference. But, in my opinion, that section does not protect any transaction from being a fraudulent preference which otherwise would be deemed so; and there is, further, an express provision in the Companies Act, 1862, that a person in the position of shareholder as well as creditor of a company cannot claim in the winding up of a company in competition with outside creditors. The present case is very like Sykes' case, L. R. 13 Eq. 255, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 49, where the articles gave a similar power to the directors to receive payment of calls in advance, and the directors paid in advance the amount remaining uncalled on their shares, and then immediately appropriated the sums so paid for their own fees, and it was held that the transaction was not bonâ fide, and that the directors were not thereby relieved from liability upon their shares. I am of opinion, then, that this appeal fails.

FRY, L.J.—The appellant contends that he has paid the whole amount on the shares held by him, and he relies on the resolution and the agreement of April 2, 1886, in support of that plea. How did things stand on that date? Eicholz had then a large claim against the company, and under an agreement of November, 1885, a sum of £3,000 was payable by the company to Eicholz on June 30, 1886, and an unascertained balance was payable in the December following. That being the state of affairs the company on April 2, 1886, affix their seal to a document by which Eicholz assigned to Kent four several sums of money, in respect of which the company agreed they were indebted to Eicholz. These sums were treated by the company as a debt debitum in præsenti solvendum in futuro, and although a debt also then existed, due from Kent to the company, it was not a debt payable in præsenti but in futuro. The company then pass this resolution. [The Lord Justice read the resolution of April 2, and continued:—] The question is, Does that transaction amount to a payment of the amount unpaid on Kent's shares within the meaning of section 25. If we were at liberty to have recourse to the very words of the section no question could arise, but the effect of Spargo's case and White's case has been to strike out from the section the words "in cash," and we are bound by those decisions. We have, therefore, to inquire whether the transaction here amounted to payment in law, and I say unhesitatingly it did not. There was no actual settling of accounts in the books of the company; there was merely a resolution, in effect, that the debt due to Eicholz "be applied"—i.e., shall be applied—as a set off against the debt due by Kent on his shares as and when the same became payable. It was not a transaction by which the sums due were treated as then payable. But, even if it were so, I think the transaction would be void as a fraudulent preference. The company was, as Mr. Kent himself expressed it, "commercially insolvent" at a period not very long before the date of this transaction, and though it is true that in the interval the arrangement with Eicholz had been come to, I cannot agree with Mr. Kent in considering that that arrangement substantially altered the position of the company. On April 5 two petitions for the winding up of the company were presented, and it is admitted that since the winding up not a shilling has been paid to creditors. To my mind the obviously true conclusion is that on April 2 the company were unable to pay their debts out of their own moneys as they became due. I think the object of the transaction was to give Mr. Kent a preference over other creditors so that he might receive payment in full when the other creditors would not.

Even apart from section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862, I think the transaction could not stand. It was sanctioned at a meeting of directors held on April 2. The position of the company was known to the directors, and Mr. Kent admitted that one of the directors, Mr. Shurley, who acted as chairman at the meeting, had promised to favour Kent's application, it being part of the arrangement that that director should be relieved from liability in respect of his own debt. If that were so I can only say that the whole transaction was either "a sham, or fraud, or deceit."

LOPES, L.J.—Mr. Kent says that the shares are fully paid up. This depends on section 25 of the Act of 1867. [His lordship read the section, and continued:—] I think the meaning of that is, that a person is to be prohibited from contracting that shares are to be paid for otherwise than in cash, except by means of a contract registered at or before the issue of the shares. In this case there has been no registered contract. Has there been payment in cash? The cases show that any transaction which would, in an action for calls on the shares, support in law a plea of payment, amounts to payment in cash. What is the nature of the agreement here? A debt payable not in præsenti is to be set off against a liability for calls on shares not then payable. There is no entry in the books of the company other than the resolution referred to. In my opinion the transaction does not amount to payment. Ferrao's case is not in favour of the appellant, but against him. There it was held that the actual writing off of the sum in the books of the company was evidence of payment. The case of Eyles v. Ellis, 4 Bing. 112, shows that such an entry in the books of a company is evidence of payment. I am of opinion, also, that the transaction of April 2 did amount to a fraudulent preference. On the other matters I forbear to make any observation.

Appeal dismissed.

In re WILLIAM HUGHES. (a.)

Imperfect testamentary instrument — Donatio mortis causâ.

A., having made his will in 1880, by which he gave the income of his property to his wife B., fell ill in 1887, and, being in anticipation of death, signed the following document:—" 1887, March 1.—I give all my insurance money that is coming to me to my wife B. for her own use, as well as £200 in the bank. This is my wish.—A. Witness, C." This document was, at A.'s request, placed with his will, and remained there till his death in April, 1887. Evidence having been admitted as to the circumstances attending the execution of the document,

Held, that it was intended as a testamentary instrument, and, not having been properly attested according to the Wills Act, could not take effect as a will.

Held, also, that effect could not be given to the document as a donatio mortis causâ, or as an immediate assignment of the property therein mentioned.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court, holding that there had been a valid transfer by William Hughes, the testator, to his widow, Hannah Hughes, of a sum of £307 8s. 1d., which had been paid by the Prudential Assurance Co. in respect of a policy of insurance on the testator's life, and of £200 standing to his credit at the time of his death in the North and South Wales Banking Co.

By his will, dated the 25th of June, 1880, William Hughes gave all his property to trustees on trust to convert and invest and pay the income to his wife Hannah during widowhood, and on the determination of her interest to pay the principal to his nephews and nieces.

In February, 1887, William Hughes was very ill; and on the 1st of March, 1887, being in expectation of immediate death, he asked his wife for his will, which was kept in a desk of which he had the key, telling her that he did not expect to live through the day. After reading over the will and explaining it to her he wrote out the following paper, and calling for his wife's niece signed it in her presence, and she attested it:—

"I give all my insurance money that is coming to me to my wife Hannah, for her own use, as well as £200 in the bank. This is my wish.—WILLIAM HUGHES.

"Witness.—CAROLINE MARY TINSLEY."

At the time of signing this document William Hughes said to Miss Tinsley: "I am leaving my insurance money and the money in the bank to your aunt for her own use to do as she likes with," and used a similar expression to his wife.

The paper was then folded up in the will, which was locked up again in the desk, where it remained until the death of William Hughes on the 19th of April, 1887.

The Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court held that the document was not a testamentary instrument, but operated from its date, and was a complete gift of the property to the wife, as a transfer.

The beneficiaries, other than the widow, appealed.

F. Thompson, in support of the appeal.—The document of the 1st of March, 1887, was a testamentary instrument in its nature and intention, and, not having been attested according to the provisions of the Wills Act, is inoperative. On the face of it the document shows that it was only to be operative in the event of the death of William Hughes; and unless an instrument is plainly intended to operate as a gift inter vivos, evidence of surrounding circumstances is admissible to show that it was intended to be testamentary: In the Goods of English, 13 W. R. 503, 3 Sw. & Tr. 586; Robertson v. Smith, L. R. 2 P. & M. 43, 18 W. R. Prob. Dig. 15; Jones v. Nicholay, 2 Rob. Eccl. 288, 14 Jur. 676, followed by Sir C. Cresswell in In the Goods of Marsden, 1 Sw. & Tr. 542, 8 W. R. Prob. Dig. 9; In the Goods of Coles, 20 W. R. 214, L. R. 2 P. & M. 362; In re Patterson, 12 W. R. 941. If, as I submit, it was inoperative as a testamentary instrument, it cannot be construed as a gift inter vivos in order that effect may be given to it.

Neville, Q.C., and P. H. Lawrence, for Mrs. Hughes, the respondent.—Though intended as a will the document may be upheld as a donatio mortis causâ, to take effect in the event of the donor's death: Stainland v. Wilott, 3 Mac. & G. 664, 677. It may, at any rate, be supported as an equitable assignment of a chose in action: Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section (6).

They also referred to Gorringe v. Irwell India-Rubber Works, 35 W. R. 86, 34 Ch. D. 128; Harding v. Harding, 34 W. R. 775, 17 Q. B. D. 442; In re King's Estate, 28 W. R. 344.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy, to the effect that the widow of Mr. Hughes is entitled under this document to the property mentioned therein—namely, a sum of about £300 secured by a policy of insurance on his life, and which has been received by his executors since his death, and a balance of some £200 at the date of the document standing to the credit of his banking account. The document upon which the widow's claim rests is in these terms. [His lordship read the document.] Now, judging both by the form of this document and by the circumstances attending its execution, and the fact that the testator placed it with his will, and that it was kept with his will until his death, I believe that this writing was intended to be testamentary. The gift is of moneys "coming to me," which, as the moneys were secured by a policy on his life, could only point to the time of his death; and I think that the same period is indicated for the gift of the money in the bank, which is joined to the other gift.

In my opinion the document is, on the face of it, testamentary, and, not being attested as required by law, we cannot accept it, or we should be doing away with the Wills Act altogether.

It has been argued that the gift, or so-called gift, may operate as a donatio mortis causâ; but, in my opinion, this argument cannot succeed. If a chattel or a deposit note be handed over by a person in contemplation of death, so as to confer a complete title on the donee, there may be a good donatio mortis causâ. But the subject of this alleged gift was not property the title to which or the evidence of title to which passes by delivery, to which property alone, speaking generally, the doctrine of donatio mortis causâ applies.

It has been suggested in argument that this document can be supported as a good assignment in equity, though not at law. This, however, is not the case. The transaction was not an assignment by the testator to the widow immediately, but only a direction that she should, after his death, be entitled to the moneys to be derived from the policy. The cases cited, therefore, on behalf of the widow do not assist her.

In my opinion the decision of the Vice-Chancellor was wrong and must be reversed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The true inference, as it seems to me, to be drawn from the document and the circumstances is that the testator intended it as a will or testamentary instrument. He had it placed with his will; it was not delivered to the donee; the condition of the property referred to in it was left the same as before; the moneys to be derived from the policy could only come to him after his death; and the document concluded with these words: "This is my wish."

It has been urged on behalf of the widow that the case is one of donatio mortis causâ. Now it is perfectly true that there may be donationes mortis causâ of policies and bonds and other documents evidencing the title to choses in action; but, speaking broadly, the subjects of donationes mortis causâ must be things the title to which, or the evidence of title to which, passes by delivery. Where, as in the present case, there is no change of possession operating as an immediate transfer, the court cannot allow the doctrine of donatio mortis causâ to be applicable. If we decided otherwise we should, in effect, be enabling persons to drive a coach and four through the Wills Act.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The real point in the case seems to me to be that to which Mr. Thompson addressed himself—namely, the question whether this document is testamentary or not. And I entirely agree with my learned brethren that it is testamentary, and, as such, ineffectual as not satisfying the requirements of the Wills Act. If, as this court has decided, the instrument is testamentary, it cannot be an assignment. So the decision of the court disposes of the argument that it is a donatio mortis causâ.

McGOUGH v. LANCASTER BURIAL BOARD. (a.)

Burial Acts, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict, c. 85), ss. 33, 38, and 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 134), s. 7—Grant of exclusive right of burial—Right to place glass shade with flowers on grave.

A burial board, pursuant to the powers of section 33 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, granted to the plaintiff "the exclusive right of burial in perpetuity" in a certain grave in their cemetery, and permitted him to erect a gravestone thereon. The plaintiff having placed on the grave a small stand with flowers on it, covered by a glass shade and wire frame,

Held, that, under section 33, the plaintiff was not entitled to place these things upon the grave, and that the burial board could remove them under the general power of control over the cemetery vested in them by section 38 of the Act.

Appeal from a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, reported ante, p. 159.

The defendants had provided a burial-ground, called Lancaster Cemetery, under the provisions of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, as extended by section 7 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134. The defendants, by virtue of the powers conferred on them by the above Acts, granted to the plaintiff, James McGough, in consideration of the sum of one guinea, "the exclusive right of burial in the grave space (describing it), to hold the same to the said James McGough, his heirs and assigns, in perpetuity for the purpose of burial," subject to the payment of certain fees reserved by the Acts, "and also subject to the regulations now in force, or which may hereafter be issued with regard to interments in the said cemetery by her Majesty's Secretary of State or by the said board or any other competent authority." The plaintiff buried his daughter in the grave, and erected a gravestone thereon with the permission of the defendants. The grave was in the unconsecrated part of the cemetery. The plaintiff without the permission of the defendants, placed upon the grave a small round stand with flowers on it covered by a glass shade, the shade being protected by a galvanized wire frame. The defendants thereupon removed them. The frame was fifteen inches high from the ground and fourteen inches wide. The defendants had for several years declined to allow glass shades and stands to be placed on the graves, and in removing the above articles they acted under their general power of control over the cemetery, and not under any special regulation. The plaintiff brought this action in the Lancaster County Court to recover damages for the alleged wrongful removal. The judge found that the wreath, shade, and frame were usual and proper, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The Divisional Court (Wills and Grantham, JJ.) entered judgment for the defendants (ante, p. 159). The plaintiff appealed.

15 & 16 Vict. c. 85 (The Metropolitan Burial Act, 1852) s. 33: "Any burial board, under such restrictions and conditions as they think proper, may sell the exclusive right of the burial, either in perpetuity or for a limited period, in any part of any burial-ground provided by such board, and also the right of constructing any vault or place of burial with the exclusive right of burial therein in perpetuity or for a limited period, and also the right of erecting and placing any monument, gravestone, tablet, or monumental inscription in such burial-ground. . . ."

Section 38: "The general management, regulation, and control of the burial-grounds provided under this Act shall, subject to the provisions of this Act and the regulations to be made thereunder, be vested in and exercised by the respective burial boards providing the same. . . ."

By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134, s. 7, the provisions of (inter alia) sections 10 to 42 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85 were extended to parishes not in the Metropolis.

Crompton, Q.C., for the plaintiff.

R. O. B. Lane, for the defendants.

The arguments were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Whatever may be our opinion as to the feelings and taste of the defendants, we have only to determine what the law is. I cannot agree with the judgment of the county court judge. He speaks of a right of property in the plot apart from and beyond the right of burial. I cannot agree with that. The plaintiff has only statutory rights, and those are the only rights the burial board could give him. If they had purported to give him more their act would be ultra vires and void. The grant therefore only gave him statutory rights. Those rights are specified in section 33 of the Burial Act, 1852. In my opinion the board have no power to grant a freehold estate in the plot. They have power to grant the exclusive right of burial either in perpetuity or for a limited period. They have also power to grant the right of constructing a vault as a place of burial; the only right that can be exercised in that vault being the exclusive right of burial therein. They can also grant the right of erecting a monument, gravestone, &c. Those three things the board have the power to grant, and any grant in excess of that would be void. The grant must be by way of sale. The plaintiff, by his grant, has the exclusive right of burial in perpetuity in a particular grave space, and I assume that he had, not by the grant but by something not before us, the right of placing a gravestone over the grave. He exercised both those rights. He went beyond that, however, and placed, either on the grave or on the gravestone, a wreath of flowers and a glass shade with a wire frame to protect them. The plaintiff had no legal right to do that. He had only the right of burial and of erecting a gravestone. I have no doubt that that right would carry a right to put an inscription on the gravestone. Therefore when he put this frame on the grave he had no legal right to do it. But the case does not rest there. By section 38 the control and regulation of the cemetery is given to the burial-board. There is no appeal from them as to the mode in which they exercise their control. It is a general control that they exercise, and I do not know that they could exercise it differently in one case from another. The board here have exercised the control conferred upon them by section 38, and I cannot see that there is any appeal from them upon that point. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns upon the true construction of two sections of the Burial Act, 1852—sections 33 and 38. By section 33 the burial board have the power, under such restrictions and conditions as they think proper, to sell the exclusive right of burial in any part of the burial-ground. Burial-grounds generally consist, as in the present case, of a consecrated and an unconsecrated part. The power to grant the exclusive right of burial extends to both parts. Then by section 38 the general management, regulation, and control of the burial-ground is to be vested in, and exercised by, the burial board. This last duty is imposed upon them. They are the custodians of the burial-ground, and it is their duty to exercise control over it. Such being their powers, they have granted to the plaintiff the exclusive right of burial in a certain grave space in perpetuity subject to the regulations now in force, or which may hereafter be issued with regard to interments by the Secretary of State or by the board. I cannot altogether disregard these last words. I cannot go the length of saying, as Willes, J., seems to have said, in Ashby v. Harris, 16 W. R. 869, L. R. 3 C. P. 523, that no regard should be paid to them. In my opinion, it is impossible to say that the board cannot prohibit a glass frame and wire cover being placed on the graves. In their view the frame is objectionable, and we have only to see whether they are acting within their legal rights. It is not like the case of Ashby v. Harris, where it was held that a right of planting flowers and renewing them could be inferred from the obligation in the grant to keep the gravestone and its appurtenances in repair. But, even assuming the plaintiff has a right to keep the grave space in repair, what he has done here has nothing to do with keeping it in repair. I cannot, therefore, say that the board could not, in point of law, object to this frame.

BOWEN, L.J.—I also think that we cannot interfere with the view taken by the burial board. With respect to the grant by the board to the plaintiff, the truth is that it creates a statutory right which must be measured by and interpreted according to the language of the statute. I think it is worth while, with a view to construe the statute, to consider what would be the rights of parishioners at common law with respect to burial in the parish churchyard. The common law is beyond doubt. The churchyard as well as the church is the freehold of the incumbent, subject to the right of the parishioners to burial there. The incumbent has certain personal rights and interests in it, but he holds it upon trust as a place of burial for the parishioners. The erection of monuments and tombstones in churchyards is a very usual practice, but according to strict law the leave of the ordinary must first be obtained. When Lord Coke says (3 Inst. 202) that the erection of tombs or monuments in a churchyard is lawful, the meaning is, as laid down by Lord Stowell in Bardin v. Calcott, 1 Hagg. Cons. 14, that it must be done with the consent of the ordinary. In practice, if the incumbent gives his consent in the first instance, the consent of the ordinary is presumed after the lapse of a reasonable time. It is to be observed that the law does not give the parishioner the right of deciding what shall be placed upon the grave. The ultimate control of that is reserved by the common law to the ordinary. Now let us consider the Burial Act, 1852. When Parliament created cemeteries to take the place of churchyards, one would expect the control over the cemetery to be reserved in the same way as the control over the churchyard was reserved at common law to the ordinary. Accordingly we find that the Burial Act, 1852, strictly defines, by section 33, what the burial board may grant, and by section 38 who is to control the burial-ground. By section 33 what may be granted by the board is a strictly statutory right, and we must look at the words of that section to see what that right is. The board may sell, under such restrictions and regulations as they think proper, the exclusive right of burial in any plot. The board may also sell the right of constructing a vault or place of burial with the exclusive right of burial therein. And, lastly, it may sell the right of erecting and placing a monument, gravestone, tablet, or monumental inscription. It necessarily follows, ex vi termini, that the first of these three grants cannot include the last, and so the selling of the exclusive right of burial does not include the right to erect a monument or gravestone. The purchaser of the exclusive right of burial in a plot buys the right which the parishioner had in his churchyard. The plaintiff has purchased the exclusive right of burial in a certain grave, subject to certain restrictions. By the terms of the grant the plaintiff bought the exclusive right of burial, subject, in the first place, to the payment of certain fees, and subject, also, to the regulations made by the Secretary of State or by the board, limitations which are authorized by the section. I will assume that the plaintiff has bought the right of placing a gravestone over the grave, or at any rate had the leave and licence of the board to do it, and that such leave and licence was irrevocable. He has, therefore, the exclusive right of burial and of erecting a gravestone. He has not got the right of placing on the grave a glass cover and frame to protect flowers. However unobjectionable it may be, he has not bought the right to do it. It was suggested in Ashby v. Harris that the right to place flowers on the grave was incident to the right of burial. I say nothing about that. That is not the case here. Further, section 38 gives the burial board the right of managing, regulating, and controlling the cemetery, and under that section the board were authorized to act in the way they did here. Therefore, upon both these sections the plaintiff's claim fails.

Appeal from the decision of Mathew, J. (reported ante, p. 553, 20 Q. B. D. 196).

The action was brought to recover penalties under section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The defendant was town surveyor to the corporation of Ramsgate, who were the local authority for the borough. In 1883, the corporation being desirous of effecting improvements in the sewering and paving of certain streets, the defendant, at their instance, took out the quantities. On these tenders were made, and three contracts were entered into by the corporation, in which it was provided that the contractors should pay the defendant for his services in taking out the bills of quantities by giving him two and a half per cent. on the amount payable under the contracts, for which amount he was to certify.

The defendant had also prepared a drainage scheme, for the purposes of which other contracts had been entered into by the corporation, in which it was also provided that the contractors should pay a percentage in respect of the bills of quantities.

Mathew, J., held that the defendant was liable to a penalty in respect of each contract as having been concerned or interested therein within the meaning of section 193.

The defendant appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., Tindal Atkinson, and Crispe, for the appellant.

Kemp, Q.C., and H. F. Dickens, for the respondent.

The arguments used were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R. (after stating the facts).—It was no part of the defendant's ordinary work as surveyor to make out these bills of quantities. He must have known that the corporation could not direct him to make them out, but could only request him to do so. There was no contract that they should pay him for the extra work, nor was there any contract between him and the contractors. The contracts were simply between them and the corporation that they should pay this percentage to the defendant, or to the corporation for the defendant. The defendant could therefore only get this percentage by the existence of these contracts. It is immaterial to decide whether he could have maintained an action against the contractors for work and labour done, since it is clear that this percentage could only be recovered by him by means of the contracts. If the corporation had sued the contractors on the contracts, and had recovered the percentage, they would undoubtedly have been bound to hold it as trustees for the defendant, and if they refused themselves to sue for it on the contracts they would, I have no doubt, have been compelled to allow the use of their name to the defendant in bringing an action to recover this percentage. The defendant could, therefore, only obtain the percentage by reason of the existence of these contracts, and can it, therefore, be said that he was not interested in them?

It has been argued that he does not come within the terms of the section unless he is able to maintain an action in his own name. I do not think that is the test. The test seems to me to be this: Could he get this percentage in any way other than by the existence of these contracts? It is plain that he could not, and therefore, in my opinion, his position is exactly that at which the Act is aimed. The larger the quantities made out by him the larger would be the amount of the contract, and the larger would be his percentage. His interest would therefore be direct and apparent. It is the very temptation at which the Act strikes. It is true that there is no impeachment whatever against the honour and integrity of this gentleman, and there is no suspicion that he has yielded to the temptation. But the intention of the Act was to guard those who might be weaker, from such a temptation, and he, although no doubt innocent, is within the terms of the section, and is struck by it. Therefore, however sorry we may be to come to such a conclusion, I think that we are bound to say that the judgment of Mathew, J., is right, and must be affirmed. I have said so much in relation to the contracts for paving and sewering the streets, but I think the position is precisely the same with respect to the drainage contracts. The judgment must, therefore, be affirmed against the defendant for all the penalties.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am unable to come to any other conclusion than that which has been expressed by the Master of the Rolls. The only question is whether this gentleman is within the terms of section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875. That section enacts that officers or servants employed by the local authority "shall not in anywise be concerned or interested" in any contract made with such authority for any of the purposes of the Act. The circumstances of this case are such that it is, in my opinion, impossible to say that the defendant is not concerned or interested in these contracts. His interest is most palpable and unmistakeable. To my mind it does not matter in the least whether his paymaster be the contractor or the corporation, or whether this percentage be called an allowance or not. If under the name of an allowance he gets something which gives him an interest in the contract, he is within the terms of the section. As long as the amount to be received by him varies with the amount of the contract it is absolutely impossible to contend that he is not interested in the contract, and he comes within the meaning of the section. I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I very much regret to have to arrive at a conclusion adverse to the defendant, but I am clearly of opinion that this case falls alike within the language used, and the mischief struck at, in section 193. I only desire to add that, in my opinion, if the percentage for the quantities had been payable by the local authority instead of by the contractors the section would be equally applicable.

Appeal dismissed.

In re BRIANT.

POULTER v. SHACKEL. (a.)

Will—Direction to deduct debts due from children—Legacy to daughter—Debt due from daughter's husband—Retainer by executor—Set-off—Equity to a settlement—Separate estate—"Absolute."

A testator gave the residue of his estate to his wife for life, and then to his children equally, "for his, her, or their own absolute use and benefit."

Held, that this did not give the daughters a separate estate.

He then directed his trustees to deduct any debt due to him from any of his said children from their respective shares. One of his daughters was married, without any settlement and in poor circumstances. Her husband was indebted to the testator, and the executors desired to set off the husband's debt against his wife's legacy.

Held, that their right to deduct the debt from the legacy was subject to the wife's equity to a settlement, and that, part of the fund must be settled on her.

Further consideration.

The question was whether a debt due to the testator by the husband of a legatee ought to be set off against her legacy, or whether she was entitled to have part of it settled on her and her children.

Robert Briant, by his will of the 22nd of June, 1875, after certain specific legacies, gave all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for his wife for life, and after her decease upon trust to transfer a share in the Whitchurch Bridge to his son R. B. Briant, and convert the residue and pay the proceeds unto all his children in equal shares for his, her, or their own absolute use and benefit. He declared that the share of Mrs. Shepherd, one of his daughters, should be for her separate use, and he directed his trustees to deduct any debt due to him from any or either of his said children, with interest thereon at five per cent., from the shares or share to which they, he, or she were entitled under that his will.

The testator died in 1877, leaving six children, one of whom, Sarah, was married to Edward Shackel in 1857.

The testator's widow died on the 5th of February, 1886.

Edward Shackel owed £725 5s. to the testator, and the question was whether this sum ought to be deducted from the share bequeathed to his wife, which amounted to about £600.

Mrs. Shackel was possessed of an income of £70 a year derived from property devised to her for life and then to her children by an uncle; and Edward Shackel had no means except that he made about £60 a year by his occupation of a rent collector. They had six children to support.

MacSwinney, for Mr. and Mrs. Shackel.—The word "absolute" shows that the legacy is for the separate use of Mrs. Shackel: Seton on Decrees, 4th ed., p. 690; In re Tursey's Trusts, 14 W. R. 474, L. R. 1 Eq. 561. [KAY, J.—That does not make it separate estate. You must have something to show that she is to take it apart from her husband.]

Marten, Q.C., and V. Hawkins, for the executors.—The husband is a debtor to the testator's estate and cannot claim payment of the legacy without paying the debt. That the legacy is to the wife does not matter, as it is by law payable to him; it is really a gift to him. It has been reduced into possession by his making a claim for it, and she has no right to a settlement. Her equity only arose when the claim was made: Bousfield v. Lawford, 11 W. R. 842, 1 De G. J. & S. 459; Osborn v. Morgan, 9 Hare, 432; Knight v. Knight, 22 W. R. 792, L. R. 18 Eq. 487; Ranking v. Barnard, 5 Mad. 32; Carr v. Taylor, 10 Ves. 574; Lady Elibank v. Montolieu, 5 Ves. 737; In re Batchelor's Estate, 21 W. R. 901, L. R. 16 Eq. 481; Ex parte O'Ferrall, 1 G. & J. 347; McCormick v. Garnett, 2 W. R. 154, 408, 2 Sm. & G. 37, 5 De G. M. & G. 278; McMahon v. Burchell, 3 Hare, 97, 5 Ibid., 322; In re Cordwell's Estate, 23 W. R. 826, L. R. 20 Eq. 644; Burrough v. Moss, 10 B. & C. 558; Hall v. Hill, 1 Dr. & War. 94, 109.

MacSwinney, for Mrs. Shackel.—It is an equitable chose in action, and there has been no reduction into possession. Mr. Shackel can do very little to support his wife, and she is entitled to a settlement out of this share. The husband's debts cannot be set off against her legacy: Taunton v. Morris, 27 W. R. 718, 11 Ch. D. 779.

Rowden, for another married daughter whose legacy was settled, and whose husband also owed a debt to the testator's estate.

KAY, J.—This case raises a difficult question of law. The facts I understand to be shortly these. The testator gives his residuary property upon trust to convert and divide the proceeds between certain persons, one of whom, being his daughter, was then a married woman. That direction was subject to a preceding tenancy for life which has now ceased. The husband and wife are both living. There was no settlement made upon their marriage. The husband is, according to the evidence, in business, which produces a very small income; and the husband and wife have six children; the only other property of the wife being the sum of £70 a year, as to which I am not told whether it is settled to her separate use or not, to which she is entitled under another will for her life.

Now, first of all, the husband is indebted to the testator in a sum of some £750, which is very much more than the share of the residue which is so bequeathed in trust for the wife; and the first question here is, whether the executors of the testator have a right to set off that debt due from the husband to the estate of the testator against the provision made for the wife? Now, as to that, the cases have determined that there does exist such a right of retainer. In Ranking v. Barnard, where there was a legacy of £1,000 to the wife of John Anderson, and John Anderson was indebted to the testator in a sum of £27,000, and he had become bankrupt after the death of the testator, the question was whether that large debt could be retained as against the legacy to his wife. The Vice-Chancellor, Sir John Leach, says:—"My present impression is, that this legacy might have been retained by the executors if there had been no bankruptcy, and that the assignees can only stand in the situation of the bankrupt, but I will look into the cases." Then at a later date he says this:—"The view I take of this point is confirmed on looking into the cases. In Jeffs v. Wood, 2nd Peere Williams, 128, the judgment of Sir J. Jekyll is in strict conformity with the opinion which I before expressed, that a legacy to the wife is at law a legacy to the husband; but in equity it is subject to a claim of the wife for a provision out of it for herself and her children. This lady has died without asserting such a claim; and the legacy, being discharged of her equity, would have become the absolute property of the husband if there had been no bankruptcy. It is clear that as against the husband the executors of the testatrix would have had a right to satisfy the legacy by writing off so much of the debt due from the husband to the estate of the testatrix, and they must have the same right against the assignees of the husband."

I take it, therefore, to be perfectly well settled that, as against the right of the husband in the legacy given to his wife, the executors of the testator may set off the debt due from the husband to the testator in his lifetime.

Then arises the question, supposing the wife to assert her equity to a settlement, the property being such as she could assert her equity against or in respect of, does the equity precede this right of retainer, or does the right of retainer precede the equity? The argument is this, and it is well founded in many of its propositions. An equity to a settlement arises when the husband makes a claim to the property. Upon his making the claim to the property he is compelled to do equity, and if the wife is not properly provided for, the court, at the instance of the wife, will direct a settlement of all her property, or a part of the property, according to the circumstances, upon her and her children. It is said that the equity only arises when the claim is made. Well, that has been modified in some of the recent cases, as we know, because now the wife is enabled, in a court of equity, to assert that equity. She may herself take proceedings to assert the equity, and even when the claim is made by the husband. That has been asserted in many cases, and was expressly decided in the case of Wortham v. Pemberton, 1 De G. & Sm. 644, amongst others. The argument therefore is, that as, according to the decision in Osborn v. Morgan, the right to an equity to a settlement really only arises when a claim is made to the fund, the husband, in this case, would be prevented from making a claim by this right of retainer against him; but I think there is a fallacy in that argument; because, of course, the right of retainer may or may not be exercised. The husband may make his claim and then the wife may say, "I assert my right to an equity to a settlement." Then the executors may say, we on our part, as against anything belonging to the husband, assert our right, as against the husband, to be paid the debt which he owed to the estate of the testator.

However, that is a matter which has been the subject of many decisions. I have here the book which is always looked to in cases of this kind—namely, "Williams on Executors," and at p. 1214 of the 6th edition I find that it is stated thus:—"At law a legacy to the wife is a legacy to the husband; but in equity, where a legacy is given to a married woman, it is subject to a claim of the wife for a provision out of it for herself and her children." Then the case of Lady Elibank v. Montolieu is cited, where it is stated in this way:—"Upon the bill of a married woman entitled to a share of the personal estate as one of the next of kin of the intestate against her husband and the administrator, the latter claiming to retain towards satisfaction of a debt by bond from the husband to him, it was declared that he was not entitled to retain, but that the plaintiff's share was subject to a farther provision in favour of her and her children; the settlement upon her marriage being inadequate to the fortune she then possessed, and it was referred to the master to see a proper settlement made on her and her children, regard being had to the extent of her fortune and the settlement already made upon her."

The case that is exactly in point is the case of Carr v. Taylor, where the wife claimed under her equity a settlement out of an interest arising to her as next of kin; and the administrator of the intestate against whose estate she made the claim sought to set off a debt from the husband to the intestate's estate. There had been in that case a settlement by the husband in consideration of the fortune or fortunes which he would have or receive upon his marriage. The settlement was an ante-nuptial settlement expressed to be in consideration of the fortune or fortunes which the husband would have or receive upon his marriage with the intended wife, and he made a settlement of property of his own. This property accrued after the marriage to the wife, and the Master of the Rolls, Sir William Grant, in giving his judgment, said:—"The doubt in this case is whether the husband ought to be considered a purchaser of the whole fortune of his wife or only of that which he was actually to receive with her at the marriage. If he was a purchaser of the whole she is not entitled to any provision out of what has since accrued; if he was not a purchaser of the whole, she will, by the rule of the court, be entitled to an additional provision out of that additional fortune. The rule is established that to make the husband a purchaser of the whole the settlement must either express or clearly import that intention. This settlement does not express that intention or clearly import it, and the meaning seems to be that the husband should take only what was to become his immediately upon the marriage. It is not alleged that the provision to be made for her was more than adequate to that fortune. With regard to the claim of set off made by the administratrix of Taylor, upon the ground that the plaintiff's husband was indebted to the estate of the intestate, whatever controversy there might have been upon the right of the husband to sue in his own name for the legal chose in action of his wife, he could not sue for this fund without joining her; and if he had obtained a decree for it in her life and died before he had reduced it into possession it would have survived. This is a case therefore in which there can be no set off for the debt of the husband." In this case the bill was filed by the married woman, seeking actively to have the settlement of the property made. As far as I can gather, the husband was living, and his assignees were parties to the action.

Then the matter came before Lord Selborne, when sitting for the Master of the Rolls, in the case of In re Batchelor, and there, according to the marginal note, it was this:—"A married woman, whose husband was indebted to a testator, having become entitled under his will to a legacy in reversion not limited to her separate use, joined with her husband in assigning it to L. for value, by deed duly executed and acknowledged by her under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 57"—that is, Malin's Act. "On the reversion falling in the executors of the testator claimed to be entitled to retain the amount of the debt and of the legacy. Held, that there was no right of retainer, and that L. must be paid in full."

Lord Selborne said this: "The general law of the court is that a legatee who is also debtor to the testator's estate cannot (unless an intention that he should do so is manifested by the will) claim payment of his legacy without paying the debt, and therefore that the executors may, in such a case, retain the debt out of the legacy when payable. It may be observed (says Sir Edward Vaughan Williams in his work on the Law of Executors) that the term set off is somewhat inaccurately used in cases of this kind. The proper use of that expression seems applicable only to the mutual demand of debtor and creditor. A right of this nature is rather a right to pay out of the fund in hand than a right of set-off. And such a right of payment can only arise where there is a right to receive the debt so to be paid; and the legacy or fund so to be applied in payment of that debt must be payable by the person entitled to receive the debt. A legacy given to a married woman, but payable by law to her husband, is in the same position for this purpose as a legacy to the husband himself. Inasmuch, however, as the husband's right is subject to the wife's chance of survivorship as long as the legacy is reversionary, and to her equity to a settlement when it becomes vested in possession during the marriage, the right of retainer for the husband's debt is also subject to those rights, and it would seem to be most consistent with sound principle that every right and power of the wife, as distinct from her husband, ought in such a case to prevail over the claim of retainer for her husband's debt."

I therefore do not hesitate to hold, as to that right of retainer, that the equity to a settlement is prior to the right of retainer by the executor in respect of the husband's debt, and I confess my own opinion goes the same way completely; because, after all, although it is said that the legacy to the wife is a legacy to the husband at law, yet the husband's right is strictly limited. The legacy is a legacy to the wife; the husband takes it in right of the wife; and, in a case like this, it is clear, as was pointed out in one of the judgments I have just read, that the husband could only sue for it joining the wife. Of course I am dealing with this case as a case which does not come within the Married Women's Property Act. I am told it does not. If the wife dies before the husband reduced it into possession I think it is equally clear the husband must take out administration. Therefore it seems to me to be reasonable to say that the right of the wife is a right, as between her and the husband, which attaches before the right of retainer against the husband on the part of the executors and administrators of the deceased, from whom and from whose bounty the wife derives this advantage.

Therefore I must hold that the right of retainer in this case is subject to the wife's equity to a settlement. Of course it would be perfectly valid and must be enforced as against any part of this fund which belonged to the husband.

Then the question arises how much of this fund ought, under the circumstances, to be settled? The circumstances, as I understand them, are these: The wife is entitled to some £70 a year for her life under a provision made for her by someone else; it does not appear (as I have before said) whether for her separate use or not. There was no settlement upon the marriage. There are six children of the marriage. The wife has been for some years partially paralyzed, and the husband is a man in a very small way of business; he seems to be indebted to this testator's estate to the amount of £725, which there does not appear to be much chance of his being able to pay, as he is making, it is said, only some £60 a year by his business. I must look, no doubt, at all the circumstances, and I do not forget, amongst those circumstances, that whatever may be settled in this case upon the wife will diminish to that extent the fund which will be coming to the other residuary legatees. Her claim really is a claim which will affect them considerably. But, upon the whole, not disregarding that circumstance, I think that I must order £500 of this fund to be settled upon the wife, and I direct it to be settled in this way. The settlement will be made by the declaration of the court now: Declare that £500 of this fund ought to be settled for the separate use of this married woman, without power of anticipation, and after her death the capital to her children as she may appoint by will, and, in default of appointment, to the children who, being sons, may attain the age of twenty-one years or, being daughters, may attain that age or marry; in default of such children, of course, the fund would belong to the wife. As to the rest of the fund, if there be any remaining, it ought to be applied, in my opinion, for the benefit of the other residuary legatees, and ought to be retained by the executors and applied by them for the benefit of the other residuary legatees, excluding the wife.

I believe that is all. The fund may be paid into court if it is thought desirable that it should be so, or the trustees may retain it in their hands on those trusts.

There is one thing I have omitted to mention in giving judgment. I ought to have noticed the case of Knight v. Knight, before Hall, V.C., which seems at first sight to be contrary to those authorities of Carr v. Taylor and In re Batchelor which I have cited. In that case of Knight v. Knight the debt which it was sought to set off was a debt due from the husband as executor. He himself was the executor, and received assets of the deceased testator who had given the legacy to his wife. He being indebted as executor, the wife sought to have her legacy nevertheless settled upon her, and it was held that no equity to a settlement arose. These other cases were not cited there, but I cannot for a moment imagine that they were not present to the mind of such an accomplished judge as Hall, V.C., and therefore I presume that he thought that some difference must have arisen from the fact that the debt in that case was not a debt due to the testator in his lifetime, and was a debt due from the husband as executor of the testator. At present I do not appreciate the difference myself, but I cannot treat it at all as an authority which would in any way overrule the cases of Carr v. Taylor and In re Batchelor, both of which cases were decided before it.

other creditors in respect of such lands or the proceeds of sale representing the same.

Certain judgment creditors of the Hull and Barnsley, &c., Co. presented a petition in the matter of that company and of the Company Acts, 1880, 1885, and 1886, and of the Railway Companies Act, 1867. On the 6th of January, 1887, an order was made appointing the persons therein named receivers and managers, and directing an inquiry whether there were any other, and, if any, what, debts of the said company, and whether the same, or any, and, if any, which of them, were incumbrances or charges on the undertaking or the tolls and moneys arising out of the same, or any and what part of the same respectively, and how the same respectively were created, and what were the rights and priorities of the persons for the time being interested therein.

Default had been made by the company in payment of the moneys secured by the debentures of the company, and the debenture holders obtained leave to attend the proceedings under the order of the 6th of January, 1887, and then took out a summons asking for a declaration that they were entitled to a lien on the company's surplus lands, or on the moneys representing the same, in priority to the claims of all other creditors of the company.

The debenture was in the form of the mortgage deed which is set out in schedule C. to the Companies Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 16).

Chadwyck Healey, for the debenture holders, referred to Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. (No. 1), 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 201, and to section 23 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867.

Reginald Bray, for the judgment creditors.

CHITTY, J., after stating the circumstances above mentioned, continued as follows: — The debenture holders come forward and say they are within the inquiry, and have either a lien, a charge, or an incumbrance upon the superfluous lands. The mere statement of that appears, after the case of Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. (No. 1), startling; but Mr. Chadwyck Healey is bound to admit that, after Gardner's case, as a general proposition, the debenture holders—by which I mean those who have a covenant or an obligation to receive payment, in other words, a statutory mortgage on the undertaking itself—have no lien or charge or incumbrance on the superfluous lands. That is the position from which Mr. Chadwyck Healey started. He has brought before me the 23rd section of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, and on that he founds an argument, relying on the words of the section as creating a charge in favour of the debenture holders. I have read the section through, and I am not satisfied that I am at the present moment in the position to say exactly what the section does mean, or to give a judicial determination as to its scope and effect. But all I have to do is to say whether this particular claim is within the section, and it appears to me that there are no words to justify the court in holding that the section has created that which did not exist before—viz., a specific lien upon the superfluous lands in favour of debenture holders who had no such lien apart from the section. The words are, "All money borrowed, or to be borrowed, by a company on mortgage or bond or debenture stock under the provisions of any Act authorizing the borrowing thereof shall have priority against the company, and the property from time to time of the company, over all other claims on account of any debts incurred or engagements entered into by them after the passing of this Act." Then there are certain provisions which I do not read now. The enactment, therefore, in that section confers a priority; but it appears to me there is involved in that some existing charge or lien. At any rate, whether that is correct or not, words which only say there shall be a priority are not sufficient to create a charge, and I do not think it is the meaning of the Legislature, whatever the true exposition of this section may be, because, if it is so, the charge would attach to the superfluous lands themselves, and the company never could deal with the superfluous lands. That difficulty was seen by Mr. Chadwyck Healey, who endeavoured to take some particular point at the time at which he said his charge (using a dangerous term of argument which counsel must have recourse to sometimes) crystallized—when the judgment creditor asserted his right as against the surplus lands. There were other equally ingenious and subtle suggestions, but none of them have any foundation whatever in the language of the section itself. Then, not accepting his argument—in fact, rejecting his argument—that there is a specific lien or charge, he seems to me to be outside the order, because it is only an inquiry as to what are the liens.

But Mr. Chadwyck Healey contends in some way or other, when the court had in its hands the proceeds of the sale of the superfluous lands sold at the instance of the judgment creditors, who have a right to have the land sold under the Act, and to be paid, subject, of course, to any prior liens, charges, or incumbrances, it was administering an estate, and that he had a right, as he said, to be paid. I cannot find that in the section. I can find nothing that will justify that, which is, to my mind, a very ingenious suggestion. I have not pretended to give anything like an exhaustive interpretation of the section itself, which I leave to a future occasion, should the section be ever submitted to judicial construction again, but the substance of my judgment is that this is not a prior security of the debenture holders.

GOODDEN v. COLES. (a.)

Mortgage—Glebe—Parties to foreclosure action—Patron.

The vicar of a parish mortgaged part of the glebe under the powers of a statute giving owners of limited interests in land power to charge the costs of certain improvements on the land. The mortgagee brought an action for payment, or foreclosure, or sale.

Held, that the patron, having no interest in the soil, but only in the right of appointment to the cure of souls, need not be joined as a party to the action.

Trial of action.

The plaintiffs were the executors of C. C. Goodden, the mortgagee under an indenture of mortgage of November 3, 1862, made in pursuance of the powers conferred on "owners of a limited interest" in lands under "The Landowners' West of England and South Wales Land Drainage and Inclosure Companies Act, 1849," between the Rev. Thomas Fitzherbert, vicar of Marston Magna, in the county of Somerset, of the first part, the Landowners' West of England and South Wales Land Drainage and Inclosure Co., of the second part, and C. C. Goodden, of the third part, whereby T. Fitzherbert charged the lands therein mentioned, being part of the glebe of the parish of Marston Magna, with the payment of £493 7s. 6d., which had been applied in the execution of drainage works and improvements thereon. The interest was paid by T. Fitzherbert until his death in 1878, when the defendant, the present vicar, became possessed of the lands in question. Interest fell into arrear, and this action was brought for payment of principal and interest, and, in default, foreclosure or sale. The defendant alleged that the patrons of the living, the dean and chapter of the church of the Holy Trinity at Bristol, ought to have been made parties.

The defendant did not appear at the trial.

Cust, for the plaintiffs.—The patron of the living has no interest in the glebe, and is, therefore, not a necessary party to this action, his only right being to appoint to the cure of souls. In an analogous case—Scottish Widows' Fund v. Craig, 30 W. R. 364, 20 Ch. D. 208—it was held that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were not necessary parties to an action of a similar character to this; and in Acland v. Napleton, an unreported case before Chitty, J., it was decided that a vicar is the "owner of a limited interest in land" within the meaning of this Act.

KEKEWICH, J.—I think the case cited by Mr. Cust of Acland v. Napleton is directly in point as to whether the vicar is an owner of a limited interest within the meaning of the Act. I also agree with him that the patron of the living is not a necessary party to a suit for foreclosure of the glebe. There will, therefore, be the usual foreclosure decree, with costs.

In re SHEFFIELD PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY. Ex parte WATSON. (a.)

Building society — Advance to, before acquisition of borrowing powers — Attempted compromise after — Loan to pay off invalid claim—Estoppel.

J. W. lent money to a building society, which had no borrowing powers, on the promissory notes of the directors. His representative demanded repayment of the amount, but eventually agreed to refrain from proceedings, the directors giving him a loan certificate under seal of the society for the sum advanced. After the loan and before the demand for repayment, the society obtained borrowing powers. The society was wound up, and the representative of J. W. claimed to rank as a creditor against the assets of the society. The county court judge disallowed his claim.

Held, that the society was not estopped from disputing the claim; that no compromise had been established, and that the transaction with the representative of J. W., being in fact an advance to pay off an invalid claim, was illegal; and that the county court judge was right.

Appeal from the decision of the county court judge of Sheffield, holding that the claim of the appellant ought not to be allowed to rank as a debt against the assets of the Sheffield Permanent Benefit Society, now being wound up under a supervision order made on the 9th of December, 1886.

The society was established in 1863, and as at first constituted had no power to borrow. In 1868 John Watson lent the society £200 on a promissory note payable three months after demand. Shortly afterwards he lent the society a further sum of £1,000 on a similar note payable six months after demand. On the 21st of June, 1876, the rules were altered, and the society acquired borrowing powers to a limited extent. In 1884 John Watson died intestate, and letters of administration were granted to the present appellant. On the 29th of December, 1884, the administrator required the society to repay the money advanced by the intestate. Several interviews took place between the solicitor of the administrator and the secretary of the society with reference to the repayment of the £1,200, and ultimately, on the 22nd of August, 1885, the administrator agreed to refrain from instituting proceedings against the society for the repayment of the loan, on the directors giving him a deposit note for the amount. On the 2nd of October, 1885, the directors gave the appellant a deposit note for the £1,200 dated the 1st of July, 1885. On the 29th of October, 1886, the appellant, in accordance with the terms of the deposit note, gave the society three months' notice to pay off the amount. The application to the county court judge was made by the liquidators of the society, who asked for directions whether this claim should or should not be allowed by them as a debt owing by the society. The judge held that the claim could not be allowed.

Buckley, Q.C., and Robson, for Watson.—The certificate, being signed by the directors and sealed, is binding on the society. The arrangement by which Watson took the certificate instead of suing for his money is a good consideration. There was, in fact, a compromise of his claim, and the company is estopped from disputing it. The directors had full powers to compromise claims.

They referred to Hill v. Manchester Waterworks Co., 2 B. & Ad. 544; Horton v. Westminster Improvement Commissioners, 7 Ex. 780; Batti's case, 26 W. R. 441, 8 Ch. D. 334.

Upjohn, for the liquidator.—The only right the depositor had in this case was to sue the directors on the debt or for breach of warranty or else, as against the society, to follow the money. There was no consideration for any compromise, and in fact there was none.

He cited Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe Brookes (No. 2), 29 Ch. D. 902, 34 W. R. Dig. 25; Cook v. Wright, 1 B. & S. 559; Southall v. Rigg, 20 L. J. C. P. 145; Fountaine v. Carnarvon Railway Co., 16 W. R. 476, L. R. 5 Eq. 316.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 27.—CAVE, J., after stating the facts of the case as above set out, continued:—Mr. Buckley, for the appellant, contended that, as the deposit note was under the seal of the society, the society was estopped from disputing its validity, and for this position he cited Hill v. Manchester and Salford Waterworks, and Horton v. Westminster Improvement Commissioners. But it is well established that a corporate body cannot be estopped by deed or otherwise from showing that it had no power to do that which it purports to have done: Fairtitle v. Gilbert, 2 T. R. 169; and there is nothing in the cases cited inconsistent with this doctrine. Secondly, it was urged that the borrower, even if he had no valid debt, was entitled to stand in the place of those whose claims against the society had been satisfied out of his money, and that he therefore had a valid claim against the society for something at all events which the directors had authority to compromise by giving him the deposit note in question. The answer to this contention is, that it does not represent what actually took place. The directors never intended to compromise a doubtful claim. They recognized the promissory notes given to John Watson as constituting valid claims against the society, which, in fact, they were not, and then gave the deposit note in question in exchange for the promissory notes, or, in other words, they issued the deposit note to discharge a non-existent liability. Hence it is clear that the result of the transaction was that a deposit note was given in consideration of the discharge of an invalid debt. The society, if the deposit note were held good, would be £1,200 worse by the transaction. How can that be regarded as a borrowing transaction? It seems clear that a deposit note given under such circumstances can have no greater validity than the alleged debt for which it is substituted. In the observations of Lord Selborne in the Blackburn Building Society v. Brooks & Co., a passage was cited to us from the judgment of Wood, V.C., in Fountaine v. Carmarthen Railway Co., in which that learned judge is reported to have said that Mr. Week's debenture was void ab initio, and the directors did not, as they ought to have done, put him in a proper position by issuing to him a new debenture. I am unable to understand the words "as they ought to have done," or to reconcile them with the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Blackburn Building Society v. Brooks, which, as a decision of the Court of Appeal, is binding upon us, and, in my judgment, governs this case. Lastly, it was said that the claim of the appellant might be supported on the grounds taken in Ex parte Chippendale, In re German Mining Co. It is unnecessary to go into the facts of that case. They are entirely different from the facts of the case before us; and the doctrine laid down there is quite inapplicable here. In my judgment the decision of the court below must be upheld, and the appeal dismissed.

WILLS, J.—In the year 1868, the society being an unincorporated building society, and having, therefore, no power to borrow, nevertheless had borrowed £1,200 from John Watson, which was secured upon notes of the directors, to be repaid out of the funds of the society. The result was that the lender had no recourse against the society to recover the money lent, but had a right to trace it and claim the securities in which it could be shown to have been invested, or to be repaid such portions as could be shown to have been expended in satisfying the lawful liabilities of the society. In the year 1876 the society was incorporated under 37 & 38 Vict. c. 42, and acquired a power to borrow, and in 1885 the transaction took place which is now impeached. The administrator of the lender gave up the notes of the directors which were his security and took in place of them the loan note of the society—an instrument good in form and constituting, if valid, an obligation on the part of the society to pay £1,200 to the present appellant personally. I take this to be equivalent to the payment by the society of £1,200 to the appellant as personal representative of the original lender and the advance of £1,200 by the appellant to the society. The question is whether, under such circumstances, an action will lie for the £1,200 so advanced. No question arises at present as to whether the statutory limit of amount was exceeded when the foregoing arrangement was made. It was strenuously argued that the loan note of the society under its seal (affixed with all due formalities), which stated that the money was lent by the appellant on the day the instrument bears date, creates an estoppel which prevents the society from now saying that the money was lent, not then, but on an earlier date, and that, if so, as the advance was made when they had power to borrow, the appellant's case is made out. It will be seen that in the view I take this proposition does not help the appellant. The only estoppel suggested is one that would oblige us to treat the money as lent at the date of the instrument; and as I start with the proposition that the transaction is the equivalent of two, one of which consisted in an advance of £1,200 by the appellant, the estoppel carries his case no farther. The objection to the appellant's case lies much deeper. It is that you must take the whole transaction together and see whether it can stand. You cannot take one half of it only and say that because if that stood by itself (and was, therefore, something very different from what it really was) it would be good, it can still stand when considered as part of a larger whole. If the whole transaction to which the appellant and the directors were parties was illegal, it is quite immaterial by what machinery it was carried out, and if both the contracting parties, with full and equal knowledge of the material facts, concurred in a transaction the effect and object of which was to make an illegal appropriation of funds of the society, such a dealing cannot be taken to pieces, and one half of it be treated apart from the other. Nor does it make any difference that the parties acted, as they did in this case, with perfect good faith. They are bound by the law, though they did not understand it. If this be once understood it seems to me that a few words are sufficient to dispose of this case. It is not necessary here to resort to the rule laid down in Chapple v. Brunswick Building Society, 29 W. R. 153, 539, 6 Q. B. D. 696, to the effect that persons dealing with a corporation having a limited power of borrowing are put upon inquiry whether that limit is being exceeded. In this transaction all the facts were equally known to both parties, and its object was that which is its essential vice—viz., that the money was borrowed for the purpose of repaying a loan illegally contracted, and to the payment of which, as a loan, the funds of the society could not be legally applied. If this be the true result of the facts it is clear that the contract belongs to a class to which effect cannot be given by a court of justice, however innocent the parties may have been of any fraudulent or immoral motive. They intended to do a thing which was against the law.

The only authority cited which gives any countenance to such a claim is Fountaine v. Carmarthen Railway Co. In that case a Mr. Weeks had lent a sum of money on debenture to the defendant company. At the time that he did so their borrowing powers were already exceeded. Page-Wood, V.C., held that this debenture was void ab initio, and added: "The directors did not, as they ought to have done, put him in a proper position by issuing to him a new debenture." I see no substantial distinction between issuing a new debenture to replace a void one—which would have amounted to a payment of the void debenture by the money freshly borrowed—and the present case, and if the obiter dictum of the learned Vice-Chancellor be right the directors in the present case did only what they ought to have done, and the loan note of 1885 was good. But questions of this kind have been very much discussed since then, and I do not think it possible to reconcile the view so presented with the later decisions of the Court of Appeal, nor, I must add, with sound legal principles. If the directors ought to have issued a fresh debenture when the company became legally capable of borrowing, in exchange for one which did not bind the company, they certainly would have been at liberty to pay the original debt out of the funds of the company, and yet this is exactly what the Court of Appeal, in The Blackburn Building Society v. Brooks & Co., held could not be done. It is impossible to reconcile the dictum of Page-Wood, V.C., with the very explicit statement of the grounds upon which the Court of Appeal based its decision in that case. Mr. Buckley suggested that in the Blackburn case the ratio decidendi was that the bankers had paid themselves, and that it really amounted to nothing more than a decision that Clayton's case, 1 Mer. 572, did not apply. To hold, however, that Clayton's case did not apply would be to hold much to the same effect as the judgment of the Court of Appeal. But it is clear that the decision went upon no mere technical ground, but upon the broad and intelligible principle that where the payment was beyond the proper scope of the authority of the directors, and where the person receiving the payment had full means of knowing, had he appreciated the fact that it was so, the money to paid could not be held by the recipient but must be repaid.

That case appears to me to be decisive of the present. If it would have been unlawful for the directors to pay the money originally lent to them, how could it be lawful for them and the appellant to make a binding agreement that they should repay him money he was lending to them for the express purpose of making an unlawful application of it? and what does it matter with what forms and solemnities such a transaction was carried out?

It was sought to support the transaction as a compromise by which the appellant, as administrator, gave up his right to follow the original £1,200 if he could, and claim the benefit of any securities upon which it was invested or the repayment of such portions of it as he could show to have been applied in payment of the legal liabilities of the society. I am not prepared to say that such a compromise might not be supported. The answer to the argument is that the facts disprove it. The transaction of 1885, moreover, must be taken as a whole so far as the society is concerned, and whatever rights the appellant, as administrator, had against the funds of the society remain, except in so far as they may be affected by lapse of time. Though the result is to be regretted, the decision of the county court judge must be upheld.

Appeal dismissed.

Slater v. Mayor, &c., of Burnley. (a.)

Compulsory payment — Right to recover back overpayment—Water rate assessed on "gross rental" instead of "rateable value"—Action for difference overpaid.

The defendants, as sanitary authority for the borough of B., had demanded from the plaintiff, and the plaintiff had paid, a water rent of £8 15s. 4d., such rate being calculated on the "gross rental" of the plaintiff's premises. The plaintiff, contending that such rate ought to have been assessed on the "rateable value" only, brought an action in the county court to recover the difference so overpaid. The defendants had no power to distrain for the rate, but they had a power to stop the water supply for non-payment; they had not stopped the water supply, and had not threatened to do so.

The county court judge held that the payment was not a voluntary one, and could be recovered back, on the ground that the defendants had a power to stop the water supply.

Held, that the payment was a voluntary one, and could not be recovered back.

Appeal, on behalf of the defendants, from the county court of Lancashire, holden at Burnley.

The action was brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendants, who were the sanitary authority for the borough of Burnley, the sum of £1 11s. 6d., which he alleged he had paid under compulsion, in respect of a water rent due in respect of certain houses belonging to the plaintiff.

The corporation, as such sanitary authority, were entitled, under their private Acts, to charge a water rent at the rate of five per cent. per annum on the "annual value." They had for some years previously adopted as their basis of valuation the "gross rental" of premises, but about the end of the year 1887 they had altered their basis of calculation from the "gross rental" to the "rateable value," believing that that was what they were entitled to as the "annual value."

The water rent for the quarter ending the 25th of December, 1887, demanded by the defendants, and paid by the plaintiff, was £8 15s. 4d., such sum being five per cent. on the "gross rental" of the premises. The plaintiff contended that the rate ought to have been assessed, not on the "gross rental," but on the "rateable value" of the premises, in which case the rate would have been £7 3s. 10d. The plaintiff had paid the larger sum, and now brought the present action in the county court to recover the difference so overpaid.

Two points arose in this case—first, whether the payment made by the plaintiff was, under the circumstances, a compulsory payment, so as to entitle the plaintiff to recover the difference overpaid, and, secondly, whether, on the construction of the special Acts relating to the borough—viz., the Burnley Borough Improvement Acts, 1871 and 1883, section 68 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, was incorporated into the local Acts, so as to make the determination of the dispute as to "annual value" of the premises by two justices a condition precedent to the right to bring the action.

The learned county court judge held that, as the corporation had the power to stop the water supply for non-payment of the water rent, the payment by the plaintiff was not a voluntary payment, and could, therefore, be recovered back.

He also held, on the construction of the special Acts, that section 68 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, was not incorporated.

This second point depended altogether on the sections of the special Acts.

The corporation had power to stop the water supply for non-payment of the water rent, but in this case they had not done so, and had not threatened to do so.

They also had a power to distrain for the water rent if the amount did not exceed 20s. a quarter, which, therefore, did not apply to the present case.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Sutton, for the appellants.—The question is whether, under the circumstances found by the county court judge, there is any evidence of compulsion, so as to enable the plaintiff to recover the money back. The judge negatived any sort of compulsion, except a kind of constructive compulsion, which a person would be under who is liable to have legal process issued against him. The judge says the corporation have the power to stop the water supply, and therefore he held that the payment was not a voluntary one. The bare point of law is whether the power to initiate legal proceedings renders the payment a compulsory one. There was no compulsion here of such a kind as to entitle the plaintiff to recover this sum back.

Philbrick, Q.C., for the respondent.—This case falls within the principle of money demanded as being due under an Act of Parliament. The doctrine was discussed in the cases of Hooper v. Mayor, &c., of Exeter, 56 L. J. Q. B. 457, 35 W. R. Dig. 134, and Steele v. Williams, 8 Ex. 625. In the former case, where the corporation had exacted harbour dues from the plaintiff under their local Act in respect of exempted articles, and the plaintiff had paid in ignorance of the exemption, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the money so paid. The same principle was laid down in the latter case. So that when the charge is regulated by Act of Parliament these cases show that the payment cannot be voluntary. There was a power to distrain if the rate was under 20s. a quarter, if the rate were above that amount the corporation could summon the person before justices when execution could be issued.

CAVE, J.—This is an appeal from Burnley County Court, in an action which the plaintiff brought to recover an overpayment made by him, and on the appeal before us two points have been taken—first, that the plaintiff could not recover, as he had not complied with a condition precedent of having the dispute as to the "annual value" determined by two justices, and, secondly, that the payment was a voluntary payment, and could not be recovered back.

The learned county court judge held that the payment was not a voluntary one, on the ground that the corporation had power to stop the water supply for non-payment of the rent. There is no case cited which lays it down that a payment made under these circumstances is a compulsory one; if it were otherwise, no payment of rent to a landlord would be a voluntary payment. The plaintiff, in the court below, elected not to give evidence, but relied on the power of the corporation to stop the water supply. In that point he was wrong, and he is not at liberty to come here and take a point not taken below. I think, therefore, that this payment was a voluntary payment, and that it cannot be recovered back, so that on this point this appeal must be allowed. [The learned judge then dealt with the second point, and held that section 68 of the Waterworks Clauses Act was not incorporated with the special Acts, on this point upholding the county court judge.]

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. In my opinion this was a voluntary payment. The respondent gave way, and paid the larger sum claimed. It appears to me that it is idle to say that there was anything like duress, or even a threat. It is simply the ordinary case of a man raising a contention when a demand is made on him. This is not sufficient to constitute duress so as to prevent the payment being a voluntary payment. It seems to me, therefore, that the contention of the appellants on this ground is well founded, and that on that point this appeal must succeed. [The learned judge then held that as to the second point the county court judge was right.]

WINDHAM v. BAINTON. (a.)

Costs—Evidence—Preparation for trial—Discontinuance before notice of trial—Ord. 65, r. 27 (9).

Rule 9 of the "Special Allowances" in the scale of 1875 enables the master, in his discretion, to allow the costs of evidence obtained by a defendant, though the plaintiff discontinues his action before notice of trial.

This was an application by the defendants in the action for an order for a review of taxation referred to the court by Cave, J.

The costs in question had been incurred by the defendants before a notice of trial had been served on them by the plaintiff. The action had been brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, who were drainage commissioners, to recover damages for injury to his banks, alleged to have been caused by their drainage operations. The plaintiff discontinued the action before notice of trial had been served on the defendants. The expenses of ascertaining the state of the banks were the costs now sought to be recovered.

By ord. 65, r. 27 (9), it is ordered: "As to evidence, such reasonable charges and expenses as appear to have been properly incurred in procuring evidence and the attendance of witnesses are to be allowed."

Sutton, for the defendants.—The evidence was prudently procured, and the master has discretion, under ord. 65, r. 27 (9), though it was not the practice formerly, to allow costs of such evidence. Sub-rules 3 and 38 show that a wide discretion was intended to be given to the taxing master. Such costs are allowed in the Chancery Division.

He referred to Harrison v. Leutner, 29 W. R. 393, 16 Ch. D. 559; Mackley v. Chillingworth, 25 W. R. 650, 1 C. P. D. 273; Turnbull v. Jansen, 26 W. R. 815, 3 C. P. D. 264.

Acland, for the plaintiff.—The old practice was founded on the reasonable ground that costs were only payable to indemnify the successful party for his expenses reasonably incurred. Curtis v. Platt, 16 C. B. N. S. 465, 12 W. R. C. L. Dig. 134, is an authority for the proposition that such costs as these cannot be considered to have been reasonably incurred. Sub-rule 37 of rule 27 reserves the old practice where not inconsistent with the new. In sub-rule 9 evidence must be taken to mean evidence used at the trial. In the cases cited in the Common Pleas the causes went to trial.

MANISTY, J.—This was an application to us to order the master to review his taxation of a bill of costs. The question raised is whether the master has, since the new rules have come into force, a discretion to allow costs in respect of matters which, in the result, are matters of evidence. The costs in question were, no doubt, not allowed under the old practice. The intention of the framers of these new rules was to give a wide discretionary power to the taxing masters, so as to enable them to give costs for expenses reasonably incurred which were formerly withheld. The question turns on sub-rule 9 of rule 27. Is Mr. Acland right in giving a narrow construction to the word "evidence" there used, so as to make it applicable only to evidence actually given? It is certainly not so limited in words, and there is no limitation in terms as to expenses incurred after notice of trial has been given in an action. It seems to me to be the fair and reasonable interpretation of the rule that the master had discretion to allow these costs if they were necessarily incurred for the purpose of ascertaining what was to be set up by way of defence. I think it is good to encourage parties to incur a reasonable expense in order to arrive at a conclusion as to what their statement of defence should allege. No doubt the cases decided in the Court of Common Pleas did go to trial, but I do not think that fact material.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Before 1875 no costs were allowed for expenses incurred before notice of trial. There is nothing said in the new rule as to such a limitation of the word "evidence" as is now contended for, which seems to me to involve the introduction of words not found in the rule. The word "evidence" is used in many senses, and I do not see why we should take the narrowest construction here, nor why this case differs from cases where evidence is procured but not tendered owing to the settlement of the action. The matter must go back to the master.

MORTGAGE INSURANCE CORPORATION v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Revenue—Stamp—Promissory note—Agreement—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), s. 49.

An instrument which was called a policy of insurance and which guaranteed to the assured the payment of £100 on the 18th of May, 1967, provided that, if the assured should be desirous at any time of surrendering the policy, he should be allowed the surrender value thereof as on the 18th day of May last preceding the date of his notice to surrender, such value to be fixed according to certain tables for the time being in force with reference to surrenders.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court, ante, p. 474, 20 Q. B. D. 645), that the instrument was not chargeable with stamp duty as a promissory note.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (ante, p. 474, 20 Q. B. D. 645) on a special case stated by the commissioners.

On June 7, 1887, an unstamped instrument was presented to the commissioners under section 18 of the Stamp Act, 1870. The material part of the instrument was as follows:—

"The Mortgage Insurance Corporation (Limited). Amount insured £100.

"This policy of insurance witnesseth that whereas W. Elkin (who, with his executors, administrators, and assigns, is hereinafter called the assured) is desirous of being insured by the corporation, as hereinafter appearing, and there has been paid to the corporation the sum of £9 17s. 4d., being the agreed premium for such assurance, now these presents witness that the corporation do hereby guarantee to the assured payment of the sum of £100 on the 18th day of May, 1967. Provided that if the assured shall be desirous at any time of surrendering this policy the corporation will allow to the assured the surrender value thereof as on the 18th day of May last preceding the date of his notice to surrender, such value to be fixed according to the tables of the corporation for the time being in force with reference to surrenders."

The commissioners considered that this instrument was chargeable with stamp duty as a promissory note, but the Divisional Court held that it required to be stamped as an agreement and not as a promissory note.

The commissioners appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and A. V. Dicey (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., with them), for the appellants.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. (Moulton, Q.C., and Reginald Brown with him), for the respondent.

The arguments were the same as in the court below. The following additional case was cited:—Crouch v. Credit Foncier, 21 W. R. 946, L. R. 8 Q. B. 374.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I should be sorry to be supposed to interfere with any of the cases which have been cited. All that I meant to say in the case of Yeo v. Dawe, 33 W. R. 739, was that the intention of the parties was an element in considering whether a document was a promissory note or not. I do not think I am differing in any way from The British India Steam Navigation Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 29 W. R. 610, 7 Q. B. D. 165, because I do not think that case governs this. I am clearly of opinion that this instrument is not a promissory note within the meaning of section 49 of the Stamp Act, 1870. By that section the term promissory note includes any document except a bank note containing a promise to pay any sum of money, and although by the latter part of the section, notes promising the payment of any sum of money out of a particular fund, or upon any condition or contingency, and which would therefore not be promissory notes in the ordinary sense of the term, are to be deemed, for the purposes of the Act, to be promissory notes, yet I think the section contemplates a promise to pay a certain and defined sum of money. I think no case would come within the section in which, although a defined sum or sums is or are promised to be paid, yet the instrument contains stipulations which may have this result: that under certain conditions an undefined and unascertained sum may become payable instead of the defined sum originally promised. I do not think that such a document is a promissory note within the section. In order to satisfy the section the main object and purpose of the document must be a promise to pay an ascertained sum. The case of Crouch v. Credit Foncier is a strong authority to show that such a document as that before us is not a promissory note within the ordinary meaning of the term. I think it is not within the meaning of the Act either. The decision of the Divisional Court must therefore be affirmed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 49 is one of a group of sections dealing with generically described documents. It is quite obvious that certain documents which are not negotiable instruments come within the Act and have to be stamped. The second part of section 49 distinctly makes instruments which would not be promissory notes, in the ordinary sense of the term, promissory notes for the purpose of the Act. But what is meant by the earlier part of the section, that a promissory note is to include any document except a bank note containing a promise to pay any sum of money? It is clear that those words must not be taken literally, or many things would be included and become liable to be stamped which were never intended to be included. The words must be limited in some way. I think that there must be a promise to pay a definite and ascertained sum, and not an unascertained and fluctuating sum, and the instrument must contain no more than this. It must be the substance and the whole contents of the document. It must be an obligation to pay a certain sum, and that must be the only obligation. If there is not such a limitation almost every document will be a promissory note within the meaning of the Act. The instrument before us contains a great deal more than a mere promise to pay a fixed sum. There is an obligation to pay an unascertained sum whenever the assured wishes it. In my opinion, therefore, the document, although it contains a promise to pay a fixed sum, contains so much more that it is not a promissory note within the meaning of section 49.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question to be decided is whether this particular instrument is a promissory note within section 49 of the Stamp Act, 1870. It is beyond question that it is not a promissory note at common law. I do not think that it can be contended that section 49 is to be construed as including in the term promissory note every document of whatever description in which a promise to pay a sum of money appears. That would be to sweep in thousands of documents containing elements altogether foreign to the idea of a promissory note. In my opinion the proper interpretation of the section is that the words mean to deal with and include documents whose contents consist substantially of a promise to pay a definite sum of money and of nothing else. Although the second part of the section brings within the term "promissory note" documents which would not be promissory notes in the ordinary signification of the expression, yet I think that the section only contemplates documents containing nothing but a promise to pay a definite sum of money. The document before us, it is true, contains a promise to pay £100 in 1967, but it also contains an obligation to pay, at any time that the assured may demand, a fluctuating sum in respect of the surrender value of the policy, to be ascertained according to certain tables which the corporation impliedly undertake to keep. That fluctuating sum may thus take the place of the definite fixed sum, and, therefore, I think this document is not a promissory note. I do not think any of the cases that have been cited to us conflict with this decision.

Henderson v. Preston. (a.)

False imprisonment—Action against gaoler—Act done in obedience to valid warrant.

No action will lie against the governor of a gaol for acts done in obedience to a valid warrant properly issued.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Manisty and Stephen, JJ.)

The action was brought against the governor of the Strangeways Gaol at Manchester for false imprisonment. On August 24, 1887, the plaintiff, who was a member of the Salvation Army, was convicted before the magistrates in petty session at Rochdale of obstructing a certain highway, and was sentenced to a fine of 5s. and costs or, in default, to seven days' imprisonment.

The fine and costs not having been paid, and there being insufficient goods to satisfy distress, the plaintiff was locked up in the police cell at Rochdale until the 25th, when he was taken, under a warrant, to the Strangeways Gaol, from which he was released on August 31. The plaintiff then brought this action, contending that the period of imprisonment ought to have expired on August 30.

The Divisional Court entered judgment for the defendant on the points of law raised by the pleadings, on the ground that the governor was protected by the warrant. The plaintiff appealed.

The material part of the warrant was as follows:—"It is ordered that the defendant be imprisoned in her Majesty's prison aforesaid, and there kept for the space of seven days, unless the said sum and all costs and charges of his commitment and of his conveyance to the said prison be sooner paid, and you, the said constables, are hereby commanded to take the defendant and convey him to the said prison and there deliver him to the governor thereof, together with this warrant, and you, the governor of the said prison, to receive the defendant into your custody and keep him for the space of seven days."

Dig. 37.

R. S. Wright, for the respondent, referred to Olliet v. Bessey, Sir T. Jones' Rep, 214; Tarlton v. Fisher, 2 Doug. 671.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It is impossible to deny that this warrant is a warrant which is justified by the Act of Parliament, and is issued by a court having jurisdiction to issue it. In its terms it is as clear as it is possible for a warrant to be. It orders the Governor of Strangeways Gaol to receive this man into his custody and to keep him in that gaol for seven days. What can be more plain than that? I am inclined to think that the best judgment is that given by Stephen, J., in the court below—"The warrant protects the gaoler, and no more need be said." In the case in Sir Thomas Jones's Reports that was so held, and from that date down to the present time no such action has been brought, or at any rate no such action appears in the books. No action can be entertained against a gaoler when all that he does is to obey the warrant that has been issued. That is enough to settle this case. Whether this person could have been released after a certain time upon a habeas corpus is a question which we need not now answer, for even if he could it is plain that this action would not lie.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that one has only to read the warrant to decide this case. The governor of the gaol receiving such warrant has no choice but to obey it. The warrant is perfectly valid and perfectly correct, and it is authorised by the Act of Parliament, and is issued by persons having authority to issue it. The governor, in obeying that warrant, did that which it was his duty to do. The warrant protects him, and is an answer to the action. The case of Moone v. Rose is distinguishable, since the gaoler in that case had not obeyed the warrant. The case of Olliet v. Bessey, and that of Butt v. Newnes, Gow, 97, against the gaoler of Newgate, show that a gaoler who has obeyed a warrant is protected by it. That is an answer to this case.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Massey v. Heynes & Co. and Schenker & Co. (a.)

Practice—Service out of the jurisdiction—Notice of concurrent writ — Alternative remedies against two defendants—One defendant out of the jurisdiction—"Necessary or proper party"—Ord. 11, r. 1 (g).

H. & Co., brokers in London, acting as agents for S. & Co., an Austrian firm, entered into a contract with the plaintiffs. S. & Co. afterwards repudiated the contract, on the ground that the agents had inserted a certain term without their authority. The plaintiffs brought an action against H. & Co. and S. & Co., claiming alternatively against H. & Co. for breach of implied warranty of authority, and against S. & Co. for breach of contract.

Held, that an order giving leave to the plaintiffs to serve notice of a concurrent writ out of the jurisdiction on S. & Co., under ord. 11, r. 1 (g), was rightly made.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Wills and Grantham, JJ.) refusing to set aside an order for service of notice of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction, and a judgment by default obtained thereon.

The plaintiffs were owners of a steamer lying at Venice.

On the 29th of July, 1887, the defendants Heynes & Co., shipbrokers in London, having received instructions from the defendants Schenker & Co., an Austrian firm carrying on business at Fiume, entered into a charter-party, as agents for Schenker & Co., with the plaintiffs.

According to the terms of the charter-party the steamer was chartered for a voyage to Bordeaux, and was to call at three ports in the Adriatic, to be named by the charterers, in geographical order from Venice, and load therefrom a cargo of wines. A dispute arose as to the order in which the ports of loading were to be taken, and ultimately Schenker & Co. repudiated the contract on the ground that the words "in geographical order" had been inserted in the charter-party by the shipbrokers without their authority.

The plaintiffs commenced an action by issuing a writ against Heynes & Co. and Schenker & Co., claiming against the former for a breach of implied warranty of authority, and against the latter for a breach of the charter-party. They then made an application under ord. 11, r. 1 (g), and obtained an order giving them leave to issue a concurrent writ for service out of the jurisdiction, and to serve notice thereof on Schenker & Co. in Austria. This notice was served on Schenker & Co. on the 2nd of January, 1888, but no appearance was entered on their behalf, and on the 9th of March judgment was signed against them in default of appearance. Damages having been assessed, final judgment was signed on the 7th of April. Garnishee proceedings were commenced, and then for the first time Schenker & Co. heard of the judgment against them. They alleged that they had not understood that the notice served on them on the 2nd of January was a notice of an action requiring them to appear and defend. Accordingly an application was made at chambers on their behalf to set aside the order obtained under ord. 11, r. 1 (g), and the judgment against them and all proceedings thereon.

This application was refused by Denman, J., and his decision was affirmed by the Divisional Court.

Schenker & Co. appealed.

J. G. Barnes, Q.C. (Hollams with him), for the appellants.—In the first place, there was no power to allow service of this notice on the appellants under ord. 11, r. 1 (g). That rule says that a writ or notice of a writ may be served out of the jurisdiction when "any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction." The appellants are not necessary or proper parties to any such action. If, on the one hand, there has been a breach of an implied warranty of authority—that is to say, if the action is rightly brought against Heynes & Co.—then Schenker & Co. cannot be necessary or proper parties. If, on the other hand, Schenker & Co. are liable to the plaintiffs for a breach of the charter-party, then the action is not properly brought against Heynes & Co. In either alternative the order was wrongly made.

He cited Yorkshire Tannery Co. v. Eglinton Chemical Co., 33 W. R. 162, and Speller v. Bristol Steam Navigation Co., 32 W. R. 670.

French, Q.C., and English Harrison, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon to argue this point.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We will give judgment on this point at once. The question is whether this rule of order 11 was intended to apply to such a case as the present. By our course of procedure a plaintiff who is in a position to claim relief against either one or the other of two persons in respect of one transaction is entitled to make them defendants in the same action, and to say in that action, that they were both concerned in the one transaction in such a way that he must have relief against one or the other. Then the rules providing for service out of the jurisdiction say that a writ may be served on any person out of the jurisdiction who is "a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person" within the jurisdiction. To what period of time does this rule apply? When is it to be determined whether the person proposed to be served is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person? Certainly the rule must apply to the time of issuing the writ. The court cannot judge of the matter by reference to the result of the action, which has not yet been arrived at. The meaning of the rule must be that where a plaintiff is in a position to claim alternative relief against two defendants, then, if one of them is abroad, he may be brought in as if he were in this country—even although relief can be obtained against him only in the alternative of its being decided at the trial that the other defendant is not liable to the plaintiff. Therefore I think the order giving leave to serve notice out of the jurisdiction was rightly made.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot doubt that this rule applies to this case.

LOPES, L.J.—I am also of the same opinion. The words of the rule, "an action properly brought," clearly point to the time of issuing the writ.

On the following day the Court heard arguments on other points, and came to the conclusion that the Divisional Court were right in refusing to set aside the judgment by default.

Appeal dismissed.

NEWLOVE AND OTHERS v. SHREWSBURY. (a.)

Bill of sale—"Receipt"—Oral agreement—Document not representing contract—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43).

By an oral agreement the title to a personal chattel was given as security for an advance. The grantor afterwards signed a receipt, which was not intended to embody, and did not embody, such agreement. The receipt was not registered under the Bills of Sale Acts.

Held, that the Bills of Sale Acts did not apply, since the title of the grantee to the chattel depended, not on the receipt, but on the oral agreement.

Appeal from the decision of DAY, J.

The action was brought to recover a lace machine or its value, and was referred to a special referee.

It appeared from his report that, on November 2, 1881, a firm of Smith & Hancock agreed with one Atkinson to manufacture for him a lace machine for the price of £681, to be paid in specified instalments—the machine to remain the property of Smith & Hancock until the whole amount was paid. A sum of £100 was paid by Atkinson, and the machine was delivered to him, but the balance had not been paid.

In March, 1883, Smith & Hancock being in difficulties, the defendant guaranteed their account at their bankers to the extent of £600, and in consideration of this they made over to him their property in the machine in question. It was agreed that, if within four months Smith & Hancock were in credit with their bankers and the defendant became entitled to revoke his guarantee, the machine and the benefit of the agreement were to revert to Smith & Hancock, otherwise the defendant was to be at liberty to sell the machine, and discharge the guarantee with the proceeds. An indorsement was made upon the agreement of November 2, 1881, in the following terms:—"Received of Mr. William Shrewsbury the sum of £580 for and in satisfaction of all our interest and property in the lace machine within described and the within written agreement. (Signed) SMITH & HANCOCK."

This document was not registered, and the referee reported that it did not represent the real transaction between the parties, since the transfer was not absolute but by way of security only. The defendant had his name painted on the machine, and in July, 1885, he bought Atkinson's interest therein and sold the machine for £400. The defendant had had to pay the whole amount of his guarantee to the bank.

The plaintiffs claimed as assignees under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors made by Smith & Hancock on December 31, 1884.

Day, J., gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and Hextall, for the appellants, contended that the receipt indorsed on the agreement was, in effect, a bill of sale, and was void for want of registration.

They cited Ex parte Parsons, 34 W. R. 329, 16 Q. B. D. 532; Ex parte Hubbard, 35 W. R. 12, 17 Q. B. D. 690; North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 35 W. R. 447, 35 Ch. D. 191; Ex parte Stooke, 20 W. R. 925.

Stanger, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Agreeing, as I do, with the view of the facts taken by Day, J., all the difficulties as to the doctrine relating to bills of sale disappear. The question is whether there was not here an oral transaction entirely independent of this receipt which would entitle the defendant to hold this machine against the plaintiffs. That depends on whether it can be said that the receipt operated as a reduction into writing of the agreement between the parties relating to the giving of this security. I think that, if the agreement was reduced into writing and was void under the Bills of Sale Act, no subsequent possession of the goods would give the grantee any right to them. That is the effect of Ex parte Parsons. But where the receipt is not an assurance of title at all, and the agreement as to the chattels is independent of any writing, then the receipt is not a bill of sale and the Acts do not apply. That is, in my opinion, the case here. There was an oral contract, which was complete before the receipt was given, and the receipt did not purport, when it was given, to reduce that contract into writing. There was, I think, an oral agreement to give a security on this machine which is not affected by the Bills of Sale Acts, and which entitles the defendant to retain it against the plaintiffs.

The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns on the general principles of the law of evidence rather than on the Bills of Sale Acts. I do not think the real agreement between the parties was ever reduced into writing. The receipt does not seem to have been intended to express it. To be a bill of sale a receipt must be a document necessary to the defendant's title, as was decided in Ex parte Hubbard, and in North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. Here the defendant's right to possess the machine does not depend upon the receipt, but upon an agreement not reduced into writing at all. The right to possession conferred by such an agreement cannot be upset by reference to the receipt. Where a person can only prove his right to the possession of goods by an unregistered document which is a bill of sale within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1878, he cannot retain them against the person entitled to them subject to his claim, but if his right can be proved by parol without reference to any document, the Bills of Sale Acts do not apply. Of course, if the document expresses the agreement between the parties, parol evidence is inadmissible, but if the agreement is independent of the document it may be proved by parol.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree, and I think the case adds nothing to the general law of bills of sale. It depends on the true effect of statements in the report of the referee. It is suggested that because, subsequently to the oral agreement between the parties, a receipt was given, the receipt must be taken to be a bill of sale. Such a view would be inconsistent with the facts. The cases show that such a document is not a bill of sale unless it is an assurance of the goods. It must be shown that the transaction depends on the document, and if the document be void, then the transaction will fail on the ground because oral evidence will be inadmissible. But here it seems plain that the transaction depended, not on this receipt, but on an oral agreement between the parties which was entirely independent of the receipt, and which the receipt was never intended to embody. That agreement could be proved by oral evidence, and not by the production of the receipt. I therefore think the decision of Day, J., was correct and must be affirmed.

Bankruptcy. July 13.

Ex parte ARNAUD.

In re BULLEN. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Debtor's petition—Single creditor—Conditional discharge—Entering up judgment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28, sub-section 6.

The court will not require a bankrupt, as a condition of his discharge, to consent to judgment being entered against him for the balance of his debts, unless there is some evidence that he is likely to acquire property sufficient to satisfy such judgment.

Quære, whether a man who has one creditor only can present a debtor's petition and obtain a complete discharge.

This was an appeal by a creditor against an order of Mr. Registrar Giffard granting the bankrupt a discharge subject to three months' suspension.

The debtor was lessee of a public-house, his interest in which was subject to two mortgages. In 1887 Arnaud, the creditor, recovered judgment against the debtor for £600, and took as security a third mortgage of the public-house. The amount of Arnaud's debt uncovered by that security (after the first and second mortgages had been satisfied) was £442.

On the 13th of December, 1887, Arnaud put in an execution, and on the 17th the debtor filed his petition in bankruptcy, and was thereon adjudicated a bankrupt.

His statement of affairs showed no unsecured creditors except (1) Arnaud, (2) a water company to whom £3 water rate was due, and who did not prove in the bankruptcy, and (3) his landlord, whose rent (£12 10s.) was due in priority to the other claims. His assets exclusive of the mortgaged property were £57 10s. The official receiver reported that the bankrupt had not kept proper books of account, and that he had continued to trade when he knew that he was insolvent, and the registrar upon consideration of this report made the order of discharge, but suspended it for three months. Arnaud appealed.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and F. C. Willis, for the appellant, contended that it was an abuse of the process of the court for a debtor to present a petition against himself, where (as in this case) there was practically only one creditor, the object of bankruptcy being to obtain an equal distribution of the assets amongst several creditors. This was "whitewashing" pure and simple, and the adjudication should never have been made. The filing of the petition was itself an act of misconduct on the part of the debtor, and his discharge should not be granted except upon the condition of the bankrupt's consenting to judgment being entered up against him for the balance of his debts under section 28, sub-section 6, of the Act of 1883.

They cited Ex parte Gaitskell, 3 Deac. 635; In re Staff, 23 W. R. 950, L. R. 20 Eq. 775; In re Aaronson, 26 W. R. 470, 7 Ch. D. 713.

A. a'B. Terrell, for the bankrupt, was not called on.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—A great deal of time has been taken up in argument as to whether the adjudication under these circumstances could be set aside. I do not express the opinion which I have upon that point, for upon this application the adjudication cannot be challenged, and we have only to decide whether the learned registrar has used his discretion properly in making this order. The learned registrar has found that the bankrupt has done wrong in not keeping proper books and in trading after he knew that he was insolvent, and for these two offences he has awarded the punishment which he thought proper—suspension of the discharge for three months. No complaint is made in respect of that punishment, and this court would not, unless in a very strong case, increase a punishment which seemed to the learned registrar the proper one to inflict. But the complaint is that the registrar ought to have made an order under section 28, sub-section 6. I see no reason why he ought to have done so, or why I would have done so if I had been in his place. The argument for the appellant was a great deal too large, and would deprive debtors of the benefit of the bankrupt laws, putting them in the position of having no discharge at all. For the offences which the debtor committed the punishment which has been inflicted is sufficient.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I see no reason for differing from the learned registrar. The question which was raised as to the power of the debtor to file his petition and obtain his discharge where there is only one creditor will require careful consideration when it arises, which it does not in this case; here there are secured creditors, and they cannot go for nothing; they have a right to sue the debtor as well as the unsecured creditors. In this case the registrar, upon the application for discharge, had to consider the conduct of the bankrupt, and when asked to annex some term to the discharge, he suspended it for three months, but declined to make an order under sub-section 6. There is no evidence that the debtor will acquire any further property from any source but his trade; he is not entitled to any reversionary interest. An order under sub-section 6 would be certain to make controversy between the judgment creditor and any future creditors, and where there is no evidence of the probability of after-acquired property, it certainly would primâ facie be wrong to make such an order; there is nothing to show that the debtor will have any property beyond what he will want to keep body and soul together.

BOWEN, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Advowson—Charity—City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 36), ss. 5, 10.

An impropriate rectory was granted by the Crown in 1589 to trustees for a parish, the purchase-money being paid by the parish. The property was conveyed from time to time to new trustees for the benefit of the said parish, and the vicar was chosen by the parishioners. The Charity Commissioners recently included the advowson in the schedule of ecclesiastical charity property under the City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883, and the parishioners presented a petition asking that it might be removed from the schedule, on the ground that it was not "charity property."

Held, that an advowson is not an exception to the general law as to charitable trusts, and that the advowson was "charity property."

Petitions.

These were two petitions under the City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883, presented by parishioners, and the questions were whether a vicarage-house and two advowsons, the presentations to which had been hitherto made by the parishioners, were charity property or not. The Charity Commissioners had included the house and advowsons in the schedule of ecclesiastical charity property.

The facts, as stated by Kay, J., were as follows:—The statute 46 & 47 Vict. c. 36 (the City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883) was passed to make provision for the better application and management of the parochial charities of the City of London, and it confers certain powers for those purposes upon the Charity Commissioners. Section 10 provides that any persons alleging that property which the commissioners have determined to be charity property within the meaning of the Act is not charitable property, but that they are entitled to the same free from any charitable trust, may apply to the High Court by petition asking for a declaration accordingly. Two such petitions are now before me, which have been argued together as they raise substantially the same question—namely, whether certain advowsons, the presentation to which has hitherto been made by the parishioners of two City parishes respectively, are charity property; and in the case of St. Stephen's Parish, whether a vicarage-house also is charity property? In St. Stephen's Parish an impropriate rectory was granted by the Crown in 1589, together with the Church of St. Stephen, Coleman-street, and all tenements, tithes, and other hereditaments to the same belonging, subject to a lease for twenty-one years, which has long since expired, to four persons named, their heirs and assigns for ever. The purchase-money of £899, expressed to be the consideration for such grant, was provided out of funds belonging to the parish, and the property has been conveyed from time to time to new trustees "for the benefit of the said parish," and the choice of the vicar has been made by the parishioners. The vicarage-house was provided by a benefaction under the will of one John Rice in 1722, and was conveyed in 1755 to the then vicar and six vestrymen, and has since been held upon like trusts for the benefit of the parish, and has been used by the vicar for the time being. The facts as to the presentation in the parish of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, are substantially the same, the living there being called "a perpetual curacy," and no house being in question. In neither case is the advowson strictly in gross, but it is a part of the rectory, and is, properly speaking, an obligation imposed upon the lay rector to provide for the service of the church.

Everitt, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the parishioners of St. Stephen's.—The house and advowsons are not charity property, and ought to be removed from the schedule. An advowson is in an anomalous position; it is not void as a perpetuity, and yet it is not a charity. A right of presentation gives no personal benefit to any parishioner. It is a trust, not a charity. It is not "property or income . . . applicable or applied" within section 5: Attorney-General v. Webster, L. R. 20 Eq. 483, 24 W. R. Dig. 48; Edenborough v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 2 Russ. 93; Attorney-General v. Parker, 1 Ves. sen. 43, 3 Atk. 576; Attorney-General v. Forster, 10 Ves. 335; Attorney-General v. Newcombe, 14 Ves. 1; City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883, ss. 5, 10, 11, 14. [KAY, J., referred to Fearon v. Webb, 14 Ves. 13.]

Jeune, Q.C., and Stuart Moore, for the parishioners of St. Mary's, supported the same contention.

They referred to Attorney-General v. Rutter, 2 Russ. 101n; In re the Christchurch Inclosure Act, 35 W. R. 538, 35 Ch. D. 355; Lewin on Trusts, 5th ed., p. 68.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and V. Hawkins, for the Charity Commissioners.—These advowsons are appendant to impropriate rectories, and are only incidents of property which is undoubtedly charitable. The doubt said by Lord Eldon to have been expressed by Lord Hardwicke in Attorney-General v. Parker is the only authority for saying that an advowson is not a charity. We submit that these advowsons are charity property: Attorney-General v. Scott, 1 Ves. sen. 412; Foley v. Attorney-General, 7 Bro. P. C. 249; In re St. Botolph Parish Estates, 35 W. R. 688, 35 Ch. D. 142; Wilson v. Dennison, 1 Amb. 82; Attorney-General v. Hewer, 2 Vern. 386; Goodman v. Mayor of Saltash, 31 W. R. 293, 7 App. Cas. 633; Attorney-General v. Bishop of Lichfield, 5 Ves. 825; Thomson v. Shakespear, 8 W. R. 265, 1 De G. F. & J. 399. An advowson is within the words of section 5, "applied for the benefit of any spiritual person."

Everitt, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 4.—KAY, J., stated the facts as above, and proceeded:—In Goodman v. The Mayor of Saltash the Corporation of Saltash were the owners in fee simple of a several oyster fishery in the creek of the Tamar. The free inhabitants of ancient tenements in the borough from time immemorial as of right exercised the privilege of dredging for oysters there. The House of Lords inferred that the corporation held the fishery in trust for these inhabitants, referring their enjoyment to a supposed grant by the Crown upon such trust before legal memory. Lord Selborne said: "A gift, subject to a condition or a trust, for the benefit of the inhabitants of a parish or town of any particular class of such inhabitants is, as I understand the law, a charitable trust, and no charitable trust can be void on the ground of perpetuity," and his lordship referred to the well-known cases which have established this law. Lord Cairns said: "A grant of that kind, it appears to me, would be perfectly legal and perfectly intelligible, and there would be nothing in it which would infringe any principle of law—such a condition would create that which, in the very wide language of our courts, is called a charitable—that is to say, a public—trust or interest for the benefit of free inhabitants of ancient tenements. A trust of that kind would not in any way infringe the law or rule against perpetuities, because we know very well that where you have a trust which, if it were for the benefit of private individuals or a fluctuating body of private individuals, would be void on the ground of perpetuity, yet if it creates a charitable—that is to say, a public—interest, it will be free from any obnoxiousness to the rule with regard to perpetuities. That is a principle of the courts which was very well explained in a well-known case in the Court of Chancery which was decided when Lord Campbell was Lord Chancellor, a case with regard to Shakespeare's house—Thomson v. Shakespear. Indeed it is a principle which has been established in many cases." In Thomson v. Shakespear the testator left a sum of money to form a museum at Shakespeare's house and a rent-charge to pay the wages of a keeper or guardian. Lord Campbell said it was quite clear that it was the intention of the testator that it should exist for ever, that the money should be laid out upon a building that was to stand and be perpetual in memory of Shakespeare, "that is a perpetuity, and, not being a charity, it is void."

On the principle stated in these decisions I should think no lawyer would hesitate to say that the trusts in question are charitable trusts, and, therefore, not open to the objection that they are void as perpetuities. But it is said that Lord Hardwicke decided that such a trust of an advowson is not charitable, and that this decision has been recognized by Lord Eldon and applied in the case of the parish of St. Stephen to this very trust by Sir George Jessel, the late Master of the Rolls.

The cases referred to are Attorney-General v. Parker, which related to the impropriate rectory of St. James's, Clerkenwell, in which the service of the church was provided for by a perpetual curate with a pension. The suit was by information, seeking to set aside the election of the curate and to establish and settle the right of election. Lord Hardwicke refused to set the election aside, and according to the report in Vesey senior, which contains only a short note of the judgment he refused to make a decree to settle the right. His words, as given in the report, are these:—"As to the question whether the court ought not to make a decree to settle the right for that being a charitable use, the information should not be dismissed, the general rule is so, but does not hold here, for nothing is a charitable use here but the pension, which is not in question. But there is no ground to establish this right, as there is no proof or examination entered into of it, nor will the court, at the suit of a few of the parishioners, put the parish to the expense of an issue to settle a right which may not come in question in several years. The whole of this information must be dismissed with costs." A longer report of this judgment is given in 3 Atk. There is not a word in that version as to its not being a charity. The only ground there stated for not settling the right of election is that there was no general allegation what was the right of election, nor so much as an interrogatory framed for this purpose, and the Lord Chancellor refused to direct an issue, because the right might not come in question again in forty years, or the curate might continue to hold it so long. But in Attorney-General v. Forster, which was again an information relating to Clerkenwell, upon a motion for an injunction to restrain the carrying out of a particular election, Lord Eldon referred to the previous decision, and also to some notes which he seems to have had of that case by Lord Hardwicke, but he said he had not been able to find any note of his judgment in detail. Lord Hardwicke had said only that he dismissed the information with costs. Lord Eldon continued: "But the passages appearing to be his notes of the argument, particularly at its close, show his opinion that it was difficult, if not impossible, to hold that the information was a due proceeding, for he thought the only object of an information by the Attorney-General was to secure the revenue of the curate who was to do the duty—viz., the stipend, between £3 and £4—and as to the nomination by the trustees to the bishop, &c., it was all a private suit, as if there had been trustees of an advowson or any other preferment, the cestuis que trust calling upon them to exercise the legal right in them according to the trust, and I doubt whether the information was not dismissed upon that principle as much as upon any other when it was found that the election could not be disturbed."

Attorney-General v. Newcombe is the report of the hearing of this suit, and in giving judgment Lord Eldon said: "There is an intimation in Vesey, and the fact is unquestionable upon Lord Hardwicke's note (speaking of it from recollection), that his lordship had considerable doubt whether, regarding the parishioners and inhabitants, whoever answer that description, as cestuis que trust of this rectory having the right to nominate the curate, that is a title so much in the nature of a charity that the party would have a right to sue in the name of the Attorney-General. Upon the same principle, I presume, as the opinion expressed in the Attorney-General v. Hewer, where the court said that, not being a free school, it was not a charity." Later on, in the same judgment, his lordship refers again to Lord Hardwicke's "doubt whether it is a charity or a beneficial interest in the ordinary nature of a right to present." Attorney-General v. Hewer was a case in which a school-house had been erected on the waste. The lord of the manor conveyed it to about eighteen of the principal inhabitants in trust, and to the intent that the inhabitants of Clapham might for ever have a school as of his gift. This was held not to be a charity. A decision which shows that the doctrine of trusts for a public varying body, being either charitable or void for perpetuity, cannot have been settled at that time. In the case before Lord Eldon reference is made to a decision of the Court of Exchequer with regard to Clerkenwell, which is reported in a note 2 Russ. 101 sub nom. Attorney-General v. Rutter. It was an information and bill, the plaintiff seeking a declaration that the election of the plaintiff might be established, the Attorney-General by the information asking to have it declared void and to have the future right of election settled. Both information and bill were dismissed as to the election actually made, but directions were given for the manner in which the parish should proceed to make a new election, which could hardly have been proper upon a bill without an information.

Attorney-General v. Webster was an information to have it declared that certain property of the parish of St. Stephen's, Coleman-street, was held upon charitable trusts, it having been conveyed from time to time to trustees for the use and benefit of the parish, and the income applied in repairs of the church, maintenance of the poor, and other parochial purposes in aid of the rates. Sir George Jessel, M.R., referred to Attorney-General v. Lord Hotham, T. & R. 209, as an express authority that this was a charitable trust, but, he continued, no authority was wanting, because "it is impossible for the defendants to make out how you could have a valid trust for the benefit of the parish, or for the parishioners for ever, without it being charitable, and no suggestion has been made except with reference to that anomalous line of cases in which it has been said that an advowson can be so held." Then his lordship endeavours to explain the supposed anomaly by saying that in the case of an advowson the parishioners get no individual profit, only a right to nominate their own vicar; "and I think it is possible," he says, "to reconcile that line of cases on this theory—that it is a mere mode of selecting the charity trustee, because the man who performs Divine service and administers to the spiritual wants of the parish is, in a sense, trustee for the parish." This far-fetched theory reads rather like the desperate attempts of a lawyer to reconcile the doubt of Lord Hardwicke with the law as it is understood at this day. There is no decision that an advowson is exempt from the general law in this respect. Lord Hardwicke, if he ever used the words attributed to him in 1 Ves. sen., did but express a doubt. The fuller report in 3 Atk. makes it extremely probable that the report in Ves. is in this respect erroneous; and that probability is greatly increased by the following cases:—

In Foley v. Attorney-General the curates of a parish had for a long time past been appointed by the parishioners. An information and bill was filed to establish their right to make the appointment, and a suit so constituted was entertained, and provisions for the future regulation of the trust were embodied in the order of the House of Lords in the nature of a scheme for the regulation of a charity. Again, in Attorney-General v. Scott, also reported under the name of Wilson v. Dennison, Lord Hardwicke himself entertained an information to establish the election by the parishioners of a minister for the parish of Leeds. In his judgment Lord Hardwicke treated it expressly as a charity, and said in so many words that the information was not to be dismissed if the charity wanted any direction, and he referred to the case in the House of Lords which I have just mentioned, in which he said he had himself been counsel.

This was two years after the case of Attorney-General v. Parker, and it is hardly conceivable that he could have intimated that it was not a charity in the one case, and held that it was in the other. These authorities are consistent with the law laid down in such cases as Attorney-General v. Hotham and the other cases referred to by Lord Selborne, and with the judgment of the House of Lords in Goodman v. Mayor of Saltash. No decision to the contrary has been cited, nor has my research enabled me to find any; and in spite of the great weight to be attributed to a supposed doubt of Lord Hardwicke, which has been treated with respectful consideration by Lord Eldon, I consider myself bound, by the authorities to which I have referred, to follow my own opinion by holding that an advowson is no exception from the general law as to charitable trusts, and that both these advowsons are held in trust for charity. As to the vicarage-house, the case is quite clear. There is no authority whatever for treating this as anything but a charitable trust. Then various questions have been raised upon the statute 46 & 47 Vict. c. 36. It is argued that it only refers to property producing income. But the words in section 5 are "property or income," which are certainly large enough to include property which does not produce income as well as that which does. It is argued that the words in that section, "Applicable or applied to or for the benefit of any parish," cannot refer to an advowson held in trust for the parishioners. I confess I do not see why not. These words would not be inapt to describe almshouses so held, or a recreation ground, or a well or pump. An advowson held by A. in trust for B. surely would be applicable for the benefit of B. in case he were a private individual; and when B. is not a private individual, but the inhabitants of a parish, why it is less for their benefit I am totally unable to understand. The further part of section 5 shows that the commissioners are to deal with "ecclesiastical charity property . . . originally given to . . . or for any spiritual purpose which is now a legal purpose, or for the benefit of any spiritual person as such"—words which seem intended to include such charitable trusts as these with which I have now to deal. The object of the statute, as appears from the preamble, is to make provision, not merely for the better application, but also for the better management of the parochial charities of the City of London. The cases which I have mentioned show the necessity for this. Applications have been made to the Court of Chancery to direct schemes of management in the case of trusts of these City parochial advowsons. The court has, as I have pointed out, in some cases entertained such suits and directed schemes. A proceeding of that kind is very costly, which seems to have been one principal reason for Lord Hardwicke's refusal so to interfere. It is plain that it was the object of this statute to provide a simpler and less expensive mode of doing this. For these reasons I am of opinion that the trusts in question are charitable trusts within the meaning of this Act of Parliament, and that these petitions must accordingly be dismissed.

The Charity Commissioners did not ask for costs, but his lordship, to discourage petitions of this kind, dismissed the petitions, with costs, and refused leave to appeal under section 10.

Baker v. Hedgecock. (a.)

Agreement in restraint of trade—"Any engagement"—"Any business"—Invalid.

A foreman tailor covenanted with his employer not to leave his service or enter the service or employ of any other persons, or enter into any engagement or be concerned or interested in carrying on, either on his own account or otherwise, any business whatsoever within the distance of one mile of No. 61, High Holborn, or any other place of business of the said employer which he then or thereafter might have during the continuance of the term of three years, or afterwards during the further period of two years.

Held, that the restraint imposed by such covenant was unreasonable, and that the covenant was not divisible into two parts, and could not be enforced.

This was a motion to restrain the defendant from being concerned in or carrying on, either on his own account or otherwise, the business of a tailor within the distance of one mile of No. 61, High Holborn, until the trial of the action or further notice.

The question was whether the court would enforce an agreement between the parties by an order in terms of the notice of motion, it being admitted that the agreement was void as in restraint of trade.

The plaintiff was a tailor, and the defendant became his foreman and superintendent under an agreement of the 23rd of January, 1886, whereby the defendant agreed to serve the plaintiff at a salary of £5 per week for three years from the 25th of January, 1886, if the plaintiff should so long require him, and in the agreement was the following clause: and also not to leave the service of plaintiff "or enter the service or employ of any other persons, or enter into any engagement or be concerned or interested in carrying on, either on his own account or otherwise, any business whatsoever within the distance of one mile of No. 61, High Holborn, or any other place of business of the said employer which he now or hereafter may have during the continuance of the said term or afterwards during the further period of two years" without the plaintiff's written consent first had and obtained.

On the 20th of April, 1888, the plaintiff, pursuant to the terms of the agreement, gave the defendant notice in writing determining the employment, and since that date the defendant had commenced business as a tailor within 100 yards of No. 61, High Holborn.

The plaintiff then commenced the present action to restrain the defendant from committing a breach of his agreement, and now moved as above mentioned.

Stokes, for the motion, referred to Baines v. Geary, 35 Ch. D. 154, 35 W. R. Dig. 64; Price v. Green, 16 M. & W. 346; Nicholls v. Stretton, 7 Beav. 42; Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co., 16 W. R. 458, L. R. 3 C. P. 235.

Vernon Smith, for the defendant.

Chitty, J.—There can be no doubt that the terms of this agreement are in general restraint of trade, and the agreement is therefore invalid. But I am asked by the plaintiff to break up the agreement and read it as if the words of the agreement were not to carry on the business of a tailor or any other business, and then to give effect to the words "the business of a tailor," and to reject the words "any other business." But the rule to be applied is that laid down by Willes, J., in Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co.:—"The general rule is that, where you cannot sever the illegal from the legal part of a covenant, the contract is altogether void; but, where you can sever them, whether the illegality be created by statute or by the common law, you may reject the bad part and retain the good." This being the rule, it is impossible to accede to the plaintiff's contention, for that would be, in fact, to create a new covenant altogether instead of explaining the existing covenant. The case of Baines v. Geary has been also pressed upon me by the plaintiff; but there the covenant was divisible into two parts, which fact distinguishes that case from the present case. The motion must, therefore, be dismissed.

Settled land—Application of capital money—Incumbrance affecting the inheritance—Mortgage for long term—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 21 (ii.).

A mortgage for a long term of years is an incumbrance affecting the inheritance of settled land, in the discharge of which capital money arising from the sale of part of the settled land may be applied under section 21 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Adjourned summons.

The question to be decided was, whether a mortgage of settled land for a long term of years was an incumbrance affecting the inheritance of the settled land within the meaning of section 21 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

The mortgage was made by trustees of a term of 1,000 years created by the will of T. Frewen, deceased, for the purpose of securing portions out of the land settled by the will. It comprised part only of the settled land.

A part of the settled land not comprised in the mortgage had been sold by the tenant for life, and the proceeds of sale were in the hands of trustees.

The mortgagee required repayment of a sum of £500, part of the mortgage debt; and a sale of a portion of the land comprised in the mortgage was unadvisable.

This was a summons by the tenant for life for an order directing the trustees to apply part of the proceeds of sale in their hands in repayment of the sum of £500, part of the mortgage debt, together with the mortgagee's costs and the costs of the summons.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 21, provides that capital money arising under the Act shall be invested or otherwise applied (inter alia) "(ii.) In discharge, purchase, or redemption of incumbrances affecting the inheritance of the settled land, or other the whole estate the subject of the settlements."

Dauney, for the tenant for life.—The mortgage for 2,000 years is an incumbrance affecting the inheritance within the meaning of section 21 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, which is designed to enable a tenant for life to convey the land free from incumbrances. Also if the mortgagee foreclosed, he would acquire a fee free from the equity of redemption, which he could convert into a fee under the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 65.

J. M. Lloyd, for the trustees, referred to the wording of section 21 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

North, J.—I think that the construction suggested by Mr. Dauney is the correct one, although I cannot say that the point is free from difficulty. The difficulty is twofold: first, section 21 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, provides that the incumbrance to be discharged by the capital money must be an incumbrance affecting the inheritance of the settled land, or other the whole estate the subject of the settlement, and a mortgage for a term of years is not on the whole estate; secondly, because, if a mortgage for a term affects the inheritance, it must do so whether the term be long or short, and whether made for securing portions, or jointure, or pin money, and it is hard to see how an incumbrance for pin money or a jointure secured by a term of years can properly be discharged out of capital money arising under the Act. But I have come to the conclusion that the mortgage in the present case is a mortgage affecting the inheritance for two reasons. In the first place, because the mortgagee might foreclose, and if he did this he would be entitled, under section 65 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to acquire the fee as being possessed of a long term not subject to any equity of redemption; and if he did acquire the fee it could hardly be said that the incumbrance did not affect the inheritance. In the second place, the tenant for life has power under the Settled Land Act, 1882, to sell the land in fee free from incumbrances, and unless this incumbrance can be paid off that cannot be done. The object of the Act is that, as between the persons interested in the estate and the purchaser, the tenant for life is to have power to bind everybody interested in the estate and to convey the estate to the purchaser in fee free from incumbrances. On these grounds, though I do not think the point clear, I come to the conclusion that the mortgage is a mortgage affecting the inheritance within the meaning of section 21 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

In re Fletcher.

Gillings v. Fletcher. (a.)

Legacy—Debt—Satisfaction—Ademption.

A testator, being indebted to his wife in the sum of £625, bequeathed to her a legacy of that amount, but without any reference to the debt. He afterwards repaid the debt in his lifetime.

Held, that the legacy must be taken to have been given in satisfaction of the debt, and that the payment of the debt was an ademption of the legacy.

Adjourned summons.

A. Fletcher having made his will in 1876, became subsequently indebted to his wife in the sum of £625, for which he paid interest; and in August, 1883, he made a codicil by which he bequeathed to her the sum of £625 for her absolute use in addition to any bequests to her in his will.

In 1883, at his wife's request, he discharged the debt by investing the sum of £625 in her name; and he also drew a pen through the bequest of that sum in the codicil, but did not otherwise revoke the gift.

In 1884 he died, and his will and codicil were duly proved by his executors.

This was an originating summons by the testator's widow, who had married again, for, among other things, a declaration that she was entitled to the legacy of £625 bequeathed to her by the codicil. The defendants were the executors of the testator, and his children who were infants.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the plaintiff.—In this case the legacy must not be taken as given in satisfaction of the debt, because no such purpose was mentioned in the codicil; and the debt was not in existence at the testator's death, so that there was then no claim which could be satisfied. The doctrine of ademption is not applicable to the present case, and the legacy, not being expressly given for the purpose of paying the debt, is not adeemed by the payment. This is not a case of double portions: Pankhurst v. Howell, 19 W. R. 312, L. R. 6 Ch. 136; In re Pollock, 28 Ch. D. 552, 33 W. R. Dig. 242; Atkinson v. Littlewood, L. R. 18 Eq. 595.

Cookson-Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the executors.—Where a testator leaves to a creditor a legacy of at least an equal amount with the debt, the presumption of law is that the testator leaves the legacy in satisfaction of the debt. The fact that the legacy in this case is the exact amount of the debt is an indication of the testator's intention: Talbot v. Earl of Shrewsbury, Prec. Ch. 394; Rawlins v. Powel, 1 P. Wms. 297. When the purpose of the legacy was satisfied by payment of the debt, the legacy was adeemed: Fowler v. Fowler, 3 P. Wms. 353; Monck v. Monck, 1 Ball. & B. 298; Wetherby v. Dixson, 19 Ves. 407; Pankhurst v. Howell.

W. F. Hamilton, for the infant defendants.

North, J.—The conclusion I come to is based simply on the legal effect of the acts done in the testator's lifetime. At the date of the codicil he owed his wife the sum of £625, and by his codicil he gave her a legacy of that amount. I cannot imagine any reason for his giving that exact sum except to provide for the payment of the debt. The debt was afterwards paid off, and the purpose for which the legacy was given was satisfied. But it has been argued that in order to treat the legacy as adeemed by such means it is necessary that the purpose should appear on the face of the will. It is clear that if the codicil had said in so many words that the legacy of £625 was given in satisfaction or payment of the debt, and the testator had afterwards paid the debt, she could not have obtained the legacy. But it is said that because there is no reference to the debt in the bequest the payment of it cannot have that effect, and the legacy must not be treated as having been given for that purpose only. If the debt had not been paid, could the widow have taken the debt as well as the legacy? I think not. The court is not disposed to hold that there is satisfaction if it can help it, and has taken hold of slight circumstances to rebut the presumption against double portions, yet it is clearly established that if there is a legacy of equal amount with a debt, the creditor cannot take both the legacy and the debt unless there is something to take the case out of the general rule. There is nothing to do so here, and it seems to me that the legacy must be taken to have been given in satisfaction of the debt; and the presumption of law, in the absence of any evidence to rebut it, seems to me to put the matter in precisely the same position as if it had been stated in the codicil that the legacy was to pay the debt. That being so, and the testator having paid off the debt in his lifetime, his estate is relieved from the legacy. Mr. Cozens-Hardy says there is no case in the books where a legacy has been treated as satisfaction of a debt except where either the debt has been in existence at the death of the testator or the especial purpose for which the legacy was given has been mentioned in the will. In my opinion, where the existence of the purpose is founded on a presumption of law, which there is no evidence to rebut, the case is in the same position as the latter case he mentioned. Lord Selborne, in In re Pollock, refers to the case where there is a reference to the purpose in the will. Such reference may be, and is, a very material circumstance; but I do not understand that Lord Selborne was exhaustively laying down the law as if he were writing a book, and no such presumption arose in that case.

If the presumption of law has the same effect as if the purpose had been expressed, there are numerous authorities to show that the legacy has been adeemed. I need only refer to Pankhurst v. Howell, where a legacy was given to the testator's wife to be paid within ten days after his death. That did not make it incumbent to pay the legacy in the ten days, because the state of the estate might be such that it would be improper to pay it within that time. During his last illness the testator, at the request of his wife, who did not know the contents of the will, gave her £200 that she might have a sum of money which she could control immediately on his death without the interference of his executors. It was held that the providing the wife with money immediately after the testator's decease was not a satisfaction of the particular purpose of the legacy. But James, L.J., says:—"The rule on this subject as stated by Mr. Justice Williams is, that where the testator stands neither in the natural or assumed relation of a parent to the legatee, the legacy will be considered as a bounty, and will not be adeemed by a subsequent advancement, unless the legacy is given for a particular purpose, and the testator advances money for the same purpose, or unless the intention otherwise legally appear of making the advancement with a view to ademption. I think this refers to a legacy given for a particular specific purpose, as, for instance, a legacy given to purchase an advowson for a son, which would be adeemed, or perhaps it would be more correct to say satisfied, by the father afterwards purchasing the advowson for him. Here the legacy does not appear to me to have been given for a particular purpose within the meaning of the rule." In the present case it seems to me that the legacy was given for a particular purpose within the meaning of the rule, because there is the presumption of law that the legacy of exactly the same amount is given in satisfaction of the debt. Under the circumstances the payment of the debt must be taken to be an ademption of the legacy, and I cannot make an order in favour of the widow. I think the costs should come out of the estate.

In re Scanlan (Infants). (a.)

Infant—Guardianship—Religious education of infant—Rights of mother as statutory guardian—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 27).

The right of a father to decide what religious education his children shall receive has not been affected by the passing of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.

Under that Act a mother, as guardian of an infant, has no greater powers, in deciding upon its religious education, than were possessed, at the passing of the Act, by any guardian appointed by will or otherwise under 12 Car. 1, c. 24.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by the next friend of three infants asking that their mother, Mrs. Scanlan, might be removed from their guardianship, and that two other persons might be appointed guardians in her stead.

Michael Scanlan, the father of the infants, was a boot-maker occupying a humble position in life. He was born at Kilkee, in the county of Clare, in Ireland, in 1845, his father being a Roman Catholic and his mother a Protestant, and he was baptized as a Roman Catholic. He appeared, however, to have become a Protestant previously to 1862, and to have connected himself with Trinity Church, Limerick. On the 27th of July, 1872, he married Margaret Oakley at the Roman Catholic Church of St. Michael, Limerick. Mrs. Scanlan was at the time of her marriage, and had continued to be, a Roman Catholic. As regards her husband she stated in her deposition that "he turned Catholic when he married her"; but there was nothing to show that he was ever in the habit of attending any of the services of that Church, or that he discharged any of the religious duties which the profession of that faith would impose upon him.

Of this marriage there were three children born in Ireland—viz., Mary, born on the 25th of April, 1873; Ann Olivia, born on the 25th of October, 1874; and Alexander James, born on the 3rd of July, 1876. All three were proved to have been baptized in the Protestant Trinity Church at Limerick. Mary was also proved to have been baptized in the Roman Catholic Church of St. Michael, Limerick, and it was stated by Mrs. Scanlan that Ann Olivia was also baptized there; although up to the time of the present application the certificate had not been found.

About the year 1879 Mr. and Mrs. Scanlan, with the three children, came to London and thenceforth resided in the neighbourhood of Soho. A fourth child, Margaret, was born to them there in June, 1880. She was baptized at the Roman Catholic Church of St. Mary, Warwick-street, on the 29th of July, 1880, and at the district church of St. Peter's, Great Windmill-street, on the 9th of July, 1882.

The son, Alexander James, died in England and appeared to have been buried at Finchley Cemetery, in the Protestant part of the burial-ground, the service being read by a clergyman of the Established Church.

The present application related to the three remaining children—Mary, now aged fifteen; Ann Olivia, now aged thirteen and a half; and Margaret, nearly eight years old.

In October, 1879, Mary and Ann Olivia seem to have been placed at the schools in connection with the district church of St. Peter's, Great Windmill-street. How long they remained there did not appear; but there was an entry of what seemed to be an admission of Mary to the same school on the 31st of May, 1880. On the 18th of September, 1882, these two children were admitted to the Board Schools at Hart-street, Covent-garden, and both attended there until June, 1883. About the last-mentioned date Mary appeared to have entered the Board School, Peter-street, Soho, and to have left it in a week.

From the 9th of September, 1883, until February, 1884, these two children attended the girls' school attached to the Roman Catholic church in Warwick-street. From February to October, 1884, they attended the girls' school in connection with the Roman Catholic schools in Ogle-street, and continued there until the 3rd of May, 1886. While attending these schools they were taught the doctrines of the Roman Catholic faith, and were, for the first time, admitted to the Holy Communion according to the rites of that faith. The evidence apparently showed that all this took place with the knowledge and consent of Michael Scanlan.

The third infant, Margaret, appeared to have been admitted into the infant school in connection with the Roman Catholic church in Warwick-street in October, 1884, and to have remained there until March, 1885. She was re-admitted in February, 1886, and remained there until June following.

In 1886 Mr. and Mrs. Scanlan ceased to live together. The causes of the separation were not perfectly clear. On the one hand it was attributed to the intemperate habits of the wife, and on the other to violence and ill-treatment on the part of the husband. Notwithstanding the separation, Mrs. Scanlan, as she stated, except during one week, went to her husband's rooms every day.

About the end of 1885 or beginning of 1886 Michael Scanlan began to be visited, first by some of the district visitors, and afterwards by some of the clergy of the parish church of St. Anne's, Soho. They found him advanced in consumption and in a state of poverty, and thenceforth to the time of his death they relieved his wants.

Through the intervention of the Rev. Keevil Davis, curate of St. Anne's, he was admitted, in March, 1887, to the North London Consumption Hospital, where he died on the 21st of April, 1887.

Mr. Davis stated that he was acquainted with Scanlan for six months previous to his death; that he was a member of the Church of England, and received the Communion from him. The Rev. Mr. Gordon, the chaplain of the hospital, stated that, so long as he was able to do so, Scanlan regularly attended the Church of England services at the hospital, and professed himself to be a member of that church.

In May, 1886, Miss Wade, one of the visitors of the parish of St. Anne, at the request of Scanlan, procured Mary, the eldest child, to be admitted into the Church of England Home for Girls, Notting-hill. She proved to be somewhat unmanageable, and was taken away from that home by Mr. Keevil Davis, and after a short time admitted to Lord Shaftesbury's Home at Sudbury, near Harrow, where she still remained.

Miss Fanny Shea, the mistress of the infant school, St. Anne's, stated that on the 6th of June, 1886, Michael Scanlan brought his daughter Margaret to the school and stated to her that the girl's mother wished her to be educated as a Roman Catholic, but that he did not; and if the mother came to take the child away he begged her not to allow her to go. From June, 1886, to March, 1887, she appeared to have attended Sunday-school in connection with St. Anne's. The evidence as to the education of Ann Olivia between May, 1886, and March, 1887, was less distinct, but Mrs. Scanlan, in her evidence, stated that "Mary Ann and Maggie" were all at Warwick-street school when she left her husband, and he took them away, and that they never went to any Catholic school after that. When Scanlan entered the hospital in March, 1887, he handed over the children—Ann Olivia and Margaret—to Mr. Keevil Davis, and asked him to take care of them. He accordingly caused Ann Olivia to be placed in the Marylebone Home for Children, and obtained her father's written consent to her going to Canada, where she was sent after his death and still remained. Margaret had been boarded out in the village of Moreton-in-the-Marsh, under the supervision of Lady Mitford.

Buckley, Q.C., and Kirby, for the next friend of the infants.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., P. S. Stokes, and St. John Clerke, for the respondent, Mrs. Scanlan.

The arguments will appear sufficiently from the judgment.

At the conclusion of the arguments Stirling, J., decided that no sufficient grounds had been shewn for the removal of the mother from the guardianship; but that someone ought to be appointed to act jointly with her. He, however, reserved for further consideration the question in what religious faith the infants ought to be brought up, the decision of that question being necessary in order to ascertain who should be appointed such co-guardian.

June 12.—Stirling, J.—In this case, for the reasons given by me at the close of the argument, I have held that the mother of the infants ought not to be removed from the office of guardian, which she holds by virtue of the provisions of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, but that someone ought to be appointed (under the powers conferred by the same Act) to be a guardian to act jointly with her. In deciding who shall be chosen as such guardian, one main element to be regarded is the religion in which the infants are to be brought up. The material facts bearing on this question are as follows:—[His lordship then stated them as set forth above, and continued:—] An examination of the evidence has convinced me that Michael Scanlan, although he assented to his children being brought up as Roman Catholics from 1883 to 1886, and to his two elder children receiving the Communion according to the rites of that faith, nevertheless during the last year of his life caused all three children to be brought up as Protestants, and distinctly expressed his wish to be that they should be brought up as members of the Church of England. It is said, and with truth, that during this period he was separated from his wife, and was under the influence of the St. Anne's clergy, on whom he was dependent for support; but, giving all due weight to these circumstances, I am unable to arrive at the conclusion that his acts and expressed wishes were inconsistent with a genuine desire for the welfare of his children or with an honest intention to perform faithfully the duties he owed to them as their father.

Now, the absolute right of a father in his lifetime to decide what religious education his children should receive has been laid down in the most pointed terms in a way well calculated to test the rule of the court.

In In re Agar-Ellis, Agar-Ellis v. Lascelles, 27 W. R. 117, 10 Ch. D. 49, James, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: [His lordship read the passage commencing with the words, "If a good and honest father," at p. 74, and ending with the words, "which the law has confided to him," at p. 75.]

Further, the law (down to the passing of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886) was clear that after the death of the father those who have the guardianship of the child are bound to see that the child is brought up in the religious faith of the father. Thus in Hawksworth v. Hawksworth, 19 W. R. 735, L. R. 6 Ch. 539) James, L.J. (at p. 542), said: "The rule of the court is, that the court, or any persons who have the guardianship of a child after the father's death, should have sacred regard to the religion of the father in dealing with the child; and, unless under very special circumstances, to see that the child is brought up in the religious faith of the father, whatever that religious faith may have been." There are, however, cases in which the father may, even in his lifetime, lose the right to have his child educated in his own religion. This was clearly laid down, and was given effect to, in Andrews v. Salt, 21 W. R. 616, L. R. 8 Ch. 622. Mellish, L.J. (at p. 638), said: [His lordship read the passage beginning with the words, "Then what difference does it make," at p. 638, and ending with the words, "possibly her health," at p. 639.] He afterwards refers to Lyons v. Blenkin, Jac. 245, and reads the passage from that case commencing with the words, "The view I have taken," at p. 255, and ending with the words, "as dangerous to society," at p. 256; and to Hill v. Hill, 10 W. R. 400, with which I shall hereafter deal. The law is similarly stated in In re Agar-Ellis, Agar-Ellis v. Lascelles, 27 W. R. 117, 10 Ch. D., at p. 72, 32 W. R. 1, 24 Ch. D., at pp. 328, 333, 338.

The case of Hill v. Hill appears to be the case in which this portion of the law has been carried to the furthest extent. It is, perhaps, best reported in 31 L. J. Ch. N. S., at p. 505. In that case the father was a Roman Catholic and the mother a Protestant. One of the two children of the marriage was baptized first as a Roman Catholic, but afterwards as a Protestant; the other was baptized as a Protestant only. Under the mother's influence the children were educated as Protestants, and nothing was ever done by the father to instruct them or to cause them to be instructed in the Roman Catholic faith. He made a will by which he appointed the mother of the children guardian, but directed the children to be brought up as Roman Catholics. He was held to have abdicated his right to direct the religious education of his children.

Now if Michael Scanlan had died early in 1886 this case would have been a clear authority for disregarding any wish or directions on his part that his children should be brought up as Protestants; but it seems to me that what took place in and subsequently to 1886 could not be left out of consideration. Not only did Michael Scanlan remove his children from the Roman Catholic schools, but he took active steps to cause them to be brought up as Protestants. He asserted his right to direct the religious education of his children, and (whatever may have been the reason) Mrs. Scanlan, though (as she says) she went to his rooms every day, did not think fit to offer any opposition to his acts, and I am unable to come to the conclusion that those acts of Michael Scanlan were done out of mere caprice, so that the court would have interfered with them in his lifetime, and, that being so, I come to the conclusion that under the law as it stood prior to the passing of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, the court would have been bound to give effect to the wishes and directions of the father as to the religious education of these infants. It remains to be considered whether that Act has in this respect made any change in the law. Certainly in express terms it has not. There is not a word in the statute from beginning to end on the subject of the religious education of children. The enactments are these:—[His lordship read the preamble and sections 2—5, and continued:—] Now prior to the passing of the Act the position of the mother was this: after the father's death, and in the absence of the appointment by the father of any testamentary guardian, she was at law guardian by nurture—that is, she was entitled to the custody and government of her sons until fourteen, and of her daughters until sixteen. Her position was, further, such that under the like circumstances it was almost of course on the part of the courts of equity to appoint her guardian of her infant children, whether sons or daughters, during their minorities. But she could not herself appoint guardians either by deed or will, nor, if the father appointed guardians, could she interfere with them: Talbot v. Earl of Shrewsbury, 4 My. & Cr. 672.

It was laid down in Reg. v. Clarke, 5 W. R. 222, 7 E. & B. 186, the well-known case of Alicia Race, that where the mother was guardian by nurture, she had (unless provision to the contrary had been made by the will of the father) in all respects the same authority which might have been exercised by the father had he survived the mother, and the court directed the child of a Protestant father to be handed over to a surviving Roman Catholic mother, although she intended to educate it in accordance with her own religious views. In that same case, however, the child was afterwards made a ward of court, and directions were given by Kindersley, V.C., that she should be brought up as a Protestant (see 26 L. J. Q. B. 176n, 3 Jur. N. S. 339n). The strength of the rule of courts of equity imposing on a surviving mother the obligation to educate her children in accordance with the religion of their father clearly appears from the cases of Austin v. Austin, 13 W. R. 761, 4 De G. J. & S. 716, where the father died intestate, and the mother was consequently guardian by nurture, and of In re Newbery, 14 W. R. 173, 360, L. R. 1 Ch. 263, where the mother had (along with another) been appointed testamentary guardian. All conflict between the rules of law and equity on the subject ceased upon the coming into operation of the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 10, which provides that "in questions relating to the custody and education of infants the rules of equity shall prevail."

Under the statute the mother who survives the father of her children is now by law their guardian, either alone where no guardian has been appointed by the father, or jointly with any guardian appointed by the father. As regards her powers as such guardian, they are to be those which any guardian appointed by will or otherwise at the passing of the Act had under the Act 12 Car. 2, c. 24. What, then, was the position of such a guardian as regards the religious education of the children committed to his charge? The answer is to be found in the passage I have already cited from Hawksworth v. Hawksworth. The guardian was to "have sacred regard to the religion of the father in dealing with the child; and, unless under very special circumstances, to see that the child was brought up in the religious faith of the father, whatever that religion may have been." And the rule applied none the less that the guardian appointed by the father was the mother. Under the statute it seems to me, upon the express terms of section 4, the mother is bound to observe this rule. It was contended, however, that the natural rights of the mother were totally different from those of any guardian, however appointed, and that the remarks made by the present Master of the Rolls in In re Agar-Ellis, Agar-Ellis v. Lascelles, 24 Ch. D. 317, at p. 332, as to the natural rights of a father applied mutandis to the case of a mother. The answer to this appears to me to be that down to the passing of the Act the law recognized the natural rights of the mother only to the extent to which I have mentioned; it was for the Legislature to consider and determine what further recognition should be given to these natural rights, and the legal position of the mother must now be ascertained, not from the consideration of those natural rights themselves, but by the true construction to be placed upon the language of the Act of Parliament which expresses the determination arrived at by the Legislature on the subject.

It was further said that the rule of law had its origin in the statutory power of the father to appoint guardians to the children; and that, inasmuch as the mother has now co-ordinate power in this respect with the father, she ought now to have co-ordinate power with him in directing the religion and education of the children. No doubt the power of the father to appoint guardians of his children afforded the means by which he was enabled to give effect to his views on their religious education; but I think that it cannot be said that it has been conclusively decided that the rule originated in the way alleged. The point was argued in the case of Skinner v. Orde, L. R. 4 P. C. 60, 20 W. R. H. L. Dig. 7, and James, L.J., in delivering judgment, says no more than this (p. 70):—"It was contended with some plausibility before their lordships that this rule had its origin in the statutory power of English fathers to appoint guardians for their children." This appears to me sufficient to show that the rule was not (even in the view of lawyers) so closely connected with the power of appointing guardians that the Legislature ought to be deemed to have abrogated it merely by conferring on the mother the power of appointing guardians; nor can I suppose that, in a matter of so much difficulty and delicacy, the Legislature intended to abolish a well-settled rule by a side wind, without even a suggestion as to the rule to be substituted for it, and without indicating how a court is to act when called upon to decide between co-ordinate authorities unhappily unable to agree on questions affecting the religious welfare of an infant.

I think, therefore, that the Act has not introduced any change in the rule as to the religious education of infants, and I must therefore direct that the children be brought up as members of the Church of England.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) June 28.

Ex parte ROSS.
In re CRIPPS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Execution—Petition—Notice to sheriff—Retention of proceeds—Time—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 46.

The fourteen days during which the sheriff is required, by section 46, sub-section (2), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to retain in his hands the proceeds of goods sold under an execution commence to run from the time of the sale, and not from the time of the receipt of such proceeds by the sheriff.

Motion calling upon the trustee in the bankruptcy to show cause why the applicant was not entitled to the sum of £343 in the hands of the Sheriff of Surrey.

The case raised the question as to the time from which the fourteen days are to run during which the sheriff is to retain the proceeds of an execution in his hands under section 46, sub-section (2), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Judgment was obtained by the applicant against the bankrupt in October, 1887, and on January 23, 1888, execution was levied.

On the 9th of February, 1888, the sale took place, but part of the proceeds were not paid until the 10th of February.

On the 24th of February, 1888, the bankruptcy petition was presented, and the moneys realized from the sale being claimed by the trustee, the execution creditor now applied to the court for a declaration in his favour.

Herbert Reed, for the execution creditor.—The execution creditor has an absolute right, unless it can be shown that he comes within sections 45 or 46 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The question is, Within what period the notice must be given under section 46, sub-section (2)? I submit it is from the time of the sale. It has never been suggested until now that the time from which the fourteen days are to run is from the time of the receipt by the sheriff. This is not a new section, and the question has always been, When was the completion of the sale? It would be very curious if, from the accident of the purchaser not paying the money for a couple of days, the execution creditor should be deprived of his rights. The words "retain the balance for fourteen days" refer back to the words "where the goods of a debtor are sold." It cannot mean from the date of receipt.

He referred to Ex parte Villars, In re Rogers, 22 W. R. 397, 603, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 432, 439; Jones v. Parcell, 11 Q. B. D. 430, 31 W. R. Dig. 21.

Sidney Woolf, for the trustee.—In both the cases cited the judges were really contemplating the fourteen days running from the time when the sheriff received the proceeds. It is then that the sale is completed. Moreover, in any case this petition was presented within fourteen days. It was taken to the office on February 23, but was refused as not being strictly in form, since it was not accompanied by an affidavit, as required by rule 258 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886.

CAVE, J.—My decision must be in favour of the execution creditor. As to the point raised with regard to the presentation of the petition on February 23, primâ facie, a petition is presented when it is received and put on the file. It might be a question whether or not a petition might be said to have been presented when, all requirements of the Act and Rules having been complied with, the clerk wrongfully refused to receive it. When that question arises I will deal with it. Here, on the 23rd of February, the petition was not in order. It was not accompanied by an affidavit, as required by rule 258, which provides that a bankruptcy petition against any debtor to any company or co-partnership duly authorized to sue and be sued in the name of a public officer or agent, may be presented by such public officer or agent, as the nominal petitioner, for and on behalf of such company or co-partnership, "on such public officer or agent filing an affidavit stating that he is such public officer or agent, and that he is authorized to present such petition." Consequently the clerk did right in refusing to receive it, as being not in order. The mistake was rectified the following day, and I must hold that the petition was presented on February 24, and not on February 23.

The other point relates to the construction which ought to be put on section 46 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. By sub-section (2), "Where the goods of a debtor are sold under an execution in respect of a judgment for a sum exceeding twenty pounds, the sheriff shall deduct the costs of the execution from the proceeds of sale and retain the balance for fourteen days, and if within that time notice is served on him of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against or by the debtor, and the debtor is adjudged bankrupt thereon, or on any other petition of which the sheriff has notice, the sheriff shall pay the balance to the trustee in the bankruptcy, who shall be entitled to retain the same as against the execution creditor, but otherwise he shall deal with it as if no notice of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition had been served on him." Now nothing is expressly stated as to the time from which the fourteen days are to run. But when we consider the subject-matter dealt with, and the question of convenience, and the reason of the section, it seems clear that the fourteen days were intended to run from the completion of the sale. Section 46 must be read in the light of section 45, and for the purposes of section 45 the date to be looked at is the date of the completion of the sale. So in section 46, sub-section (2), it is convenient that the same date should apply. Fourteen days primâ facie means fourteen days from the sale, which is the occasion or occurrence on which the duty of the sheriff under the section arises. But it is said that the words of the section are better satisfied if the fourteen days are held to run from the receipt of the proceeds by the sheriff. The sheriff is to "retain the balance for fourteen days," and it is said, How can a man retain that which he has not got? But the words that the sheriff shall retain the balance are not used with reference to the proceeds in his hands. The contrast is between the sheriff retaining it and the sheriff paying it over to a creditor. It is not a question as to having the money in his hands, but it really means that the sheriff shall not pay over until fourteen days have elapsed. It is also said that by the section "the sheriff shall deduct the costs of the execution from the proceeds of sale," and that that points to the fact that the fourteen days run from the receipt of the last shilling. But there is really no force in that argument. The deduction may take place at any time, and all that is meant is that, whether the money is the trustee's or the creditor's, the costs of the execution are to be paid. This is what the Legislature had in view, and public convenience clearly lies in the view I take. The completion of the sale is a matter which is generally known, but with regard to the receipt of the money it is very different. It is quite possible that a purchaser might get hold of some article without paying for it, and even necessitate his being sued, which would give rise to great difficulty. The general notion of the Act seems to be that a creditor shall not have any benefit of his execution if, before the sale is completed, a receiving order is made, and, further, he shall not have the money where the goods are sold if, within fourteen days, a petition in bankruptcy is presented. My judgment is, therefore, that the fourteen days must run from the completion of the sale, and not from the time of the receipt of the money.

Bankruptcy—Petition dismissed—Substitution of other creditors as petitioning creditors — Jurisdiction — Practice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 104, 107.

On October 11, 1887, a bankruptcy petition was dismissed by the county court registrar, on the ground that the petitioning creditor, by assenting to a deed of assignment previously executed by the debtor, was prevented from alleging such deed as an act of bankruptcy, but the order of the registrar was subsequently rescinded by the county court judge, who made an order substituting other creditors, who had not assented to the deed as petitioning creditors, the three months during which the deed could be relied upon as an act of bankruptcy having then expired.

Held, that the county court judge had no authority to rescind the order made by the registrar; that the order made by him substituting other petitioning creditors was not warranted by any section of the Bankruptcy Act; and that, even if the county court judge had power to make the order, he ought not, on the facts, to have exercised it.

Appeal against an order of his Honour Judge Bedwell, in the county court at Hull, by which he rescinded an order made by the registrar of the said county court, dismissing a bankruptcy petition against the debtor, and substituted the present respondents as petitioning creditors in lieu of the original petitioning creditor under section 107 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

On the 7th of July, 1887, the debtor executed a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors generally, which was assented to by a large number of the creditors, and on the 17th of September, 1887, in order to prevent proceedings from being taken by a creditor who dissented, a bankruptcy petition was filed against the debtor by an assenting creditor, the solicitor acting in the matter having overlooked the fact that by assenting to the deed such creditor had precluded himself from relying upon it as an act of bankruptcy.

On the 11th of October, 1887, this petition was dismissed by the county court registrar, the three months during which the deed could be relied upon as an act of bankruptcy having expired on the 7th of October, but on the 5th of December, 1887, motion was made by Messrs. Walker and Hall, the present respondents, to the county court judge to rescind the order of the registrar dismissing the petition, and to substitute them as petitioning creditors. The application having been granted, the debtor now appealed.

Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C., A.G., and Yate Lee, for the debtor.—The county court judge had no power to make the order after the petition had been dismissed, and there are no facts to justify the substitution even if there was jurisdiction. The present respondents knew of the deed the whole time, and with full knowledge of it they allowed the three months to go by. The county court judge could only act under section 107 if the petitioner did not proceed with due diligence. There was no want of diligence here, and there is no power to make a bad petition good.

Herbert Reed, for the respondents.—The respondents were led to believe that the petition of the 17th of September, 1887, was presented by the debtor against himself, and they were thus dishonestly prevented from taking advantage of the deed as an act of bankruptcy. They are fully justified in obtaining the order which has been made: Ex parte Harris, In re Ash, 14 W. R. 738, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 469; In re Bristow, 16 W. R. 385, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 247. The county court judge had a right to rescind the order of the registrar under section 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Cave, J.—This appeal must be allowed. On the 17th of September, 1887, a petition was presented against the debtor, which was dismissed on the 11th of October by the registrar, and on the 5th of December an application was made to the county court judge to rescind the order of the registrar, and to substitute the respondents as petitioners, which was allowed. Now in the first place I am of opinion that the judge had no authority at all to make the order which he did, and, in the second place, that if he had authority he ought not to have exercised it. The order was made by the registrar, and there was no right to apply to the judge to rescind that order of the registrar any more than there would be a right to apply to the registrar to rescind an order of the judge. The judge and the registrar have each certain duties to perform, and the person who makes an order has power, under the Bankruptcy Act, to rehear and rescind it. The duties are in great measure distinct, and to allow one to rehear and rescind the order of another, as, for example, the judge to rehear the order of the registrar, would be to give a right of appeal which does not exist. Further than this, the order made is not warranted by any section in the Bankruptcy Act. Under section 107, where the petitioner does not proceed with due diligence on his petition, the court may substitute as petitioner any other creditor to whom the debtor may be indebted in the required amount. In this case the petition had actually been dismissed on the 11th of October, and at that time no one could present a petition founded on the deed as an act of bankruptcy. The effect of what has been done is to extend the time for filing a petition on such an act of bankruptcy as that. Moreover, from the facts it is clear that the respondents acted throughout in all they did solely for their own individual interests, and even if the power existed to make the order the county court judge ought not, in my opinion, to have exercised it.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only wish to add a word as to the right of the county court judge to rescind this order of the registrar. Section 104 says that "every court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under this Act may review, rescind, or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction." The meaning, as I take it, is that the court which makes the order, the same court can rehear and vary it. Then turn to section 168, which defines "the court" as meaning the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under this Act, and by rule 3 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, "the court" includes a registrar when exercising the powers of the court pursuant to the Act or Rules. In my opinion, therefore, the county court judge had no right to make the order.

Appeal allowed, with costs.

Administration—Grant to guardian for use and benefit of minor—No notice to relatives.

A testator by his will devised his property to children who at his death were minors, and directed that a trustee should be appointed by the court under the statutory powers in that behalf, and such trustee should also be executor, but that no relation of his should be so appointed.

The minors' relatives having been shown by affidavit to be undesirable persons to receive the grant, being persons unknown to the children, and living at a distance, or whose whereabouts were in some cases unknown, the court granted letters of administration, with the will annexed, for the use and benefit of the minors until one of them should attain the age of twenty-one, to a guardian elected by them without requiring notice of the motion to be served on their relatives.

Motion for grant of letters of administration with the will annexed of the testator, G. H. Webb, deceased, to E. A. Rich as the guardian duly elected by the testator's children, for their use and benefit until one of them should attain the age of twenty-one years.

The testator died on the 28th of January, 1888, a widower, leaving three children, aged eighteen, sixteen, and thirteen respectively, surviving him.

By his will, dated the 1st of July, 1887, he devised his whole property, consisting of leasehold and freehold property and household effects of the value of £2,637, for the benefit of his children, but refrained from appointing a trustee or executor, stating that he was unable at that time to name a suitable person, and he directed that the statutory powers of appointing trustees should be incorporated in his will, and he directed that if he did not by any codicil appoint any person as trustee or executor until his son or daughters attained the age of twenty-one, then the person appointed by the court exercising jurisdiction under the statute should have all the powers of an executor; but in no case should any relative of his be so appointed by the court as trustee or executor of the will. He never executed any codicil to the will.

The affidavits showed that the relatives on the paternal side were a half-brother, William, believed to have been unfortunate in business, and unknown to the children; an aunt by marriage, who had renounced any right to the grant or guardianship; an uncle, for many years resident in New Zealand, whose whereabouts were unknown; another uncle, residing in Suffolk, nearly eighty years of age, and unknown to the children. And on the maternal side an unmarried sister, residing in Paris, and a half-brother, believed to be in reduced circumstances, but whose whereabouts were unknown.

The children had, on the 28th of February, elected E. A. Rich to act as their curator and guardian and to apply for the grant. No notice had been given of this application to any of the relatives except to the aunt who had renounced.

Middleton, in support of the motion, referred to In the Goods of Gardiner, 32 W. R. 756, 9 P. D. 66, where the court made a similar grant.

BUTT, J.—I am disposed to make the grant without notice to these parties, although the right to a grant is like every other right, and a man ought not to be deprived of it without being heard. On the whole, however, in this case I think it may be made, but the practice should not be carried any further.

Will and codicil—Executor trustees—Trustee substituted—Not named as executor—Executor according to the tenor.

A testator appointed the trustees of his will executors thereof, and on the death of one of them he substituted another person as trustee, and made certain alterations in the division of his property, whereby his trustees were required to get in all his estate and invest and distribute it, after the payment of funeral and other expenses.

Held, that such other person was entitled, jointly with the other executors, to probate as executor according to the tenor of the will.

Motion for grant of probate of a will and two codicils, dated January 24, 1882, April 15, 1887, and July 28, 1887, respectively, made and duly executed by Hugh Lush, who died on August 1, 1887, to Kate Lush and Hugh Lush, as executors named in the will, and to George Boyton, as executor according to the tenor of the will and codicils.

By his will the testator appointed his wife, Kate Lush, and her two sons, Uriah Lush and Hugh Lush, his trustees for certain purposes, and he also appointed them his executors.

Uriah Lush died some years after the execution of the will, and subsequently the testator, by his first codicil, after reciting the death of Uriah Lush, mentioned in his will as one of his trustees, thereby appointed "another trustee," and made certain alterations in the division of his property, and thereby directed his trustees thereinafter mentioned to get in all his property and invest the same, and, after paying funeral and other expenses, distribute the residue and remainder as stated in the will, and he thereby appointed Kate Lush, his wife, Hugh Lush, his son, and George Boyton, in place of his son Uriah Lush, deceased, as trustees of his codicil.

Searle, in support of the motion, cited In re Bell, 4 P. D. 85, 27 W. R. Dig. 237; In the Goods of Punchard, 20 W. R. 446, L. R. 2 P. & D. 369; In the Goods of Baylis, L. R. 1 P. & D. 21, 14 W. R. Prob. & Div. Dig. 11; Williams on Executors, 8th ed., p. 248.

HANNEN, P., held that the reasonable construction to be put on the codicil was that the testator intended George Boyton to be substituted as executor. The trustees were to get in the whole estate, to distribute it, and to pay certain expenses. If Mr. Boyton was not intended to be an executor, after getting in the estate the trustees must hand the money over to the executors, only to receive it back again to distribute. He therefore directed a grant of probate to George Boyton as executor according to the tenor in conjunction with the other two surviving executors named in the will.

Motion allowed.

Probate — Practice — Administration to creditor—Absconding administrator—Revocation of grant—New grant to next of kin.

Where a grant of administration had been made to a creditor who, after satisfying his debt, was made bankrupt and absconded, and a personal representative was required, the court revoked the grant to the creditor without citing him, and made a fresh grant to the next of kin of the deceased.

Application for grant of letters of administration of the estate of the late Charles Bradshaw, the original administrator having absconded.

Charles Bradshaw died on the 23rd day of February, 1869, intestate, leaving his widow, Ellen Bradshaw, and his only child, Catherine Macnab Bradshaw, him surviving. On the 15th of August, 1869, letters of administration of the credit and effects of the deceased were granted to Nehemiah Learoyd, of London, solicitor, as a creditor, upon the renunciation of the widow and daughter. On November 14, 1885, a receiving order was made against Mr. Learoyd, upon which he was adjudged bankrupt, and in December, 1885, he absconded, and the affidavits stated various attempts to discover him, but in vain.

On March 7, 1886, Mrs. Bradshaw died, and two policies of insurance on her life for £1,000 each, effected by Charles Bradshaw, fell in, and L. W. Armitage, together with S. Albert Ray Rollit and William Day, claimed to be creditors on the estate of Charles Bradshaw in respect of moneys advanced on the security of these policies, and they had commenced an action, Rollit v. London Assurance Co., in the Chancery Division for the administration of the trusts of the will, and a personal representative of Charles Bradshaw was required to represent his estate.

The debt due to Mr. Learoyd had been discharged.

Nov. 1.—Bayford, Q.C., and Price, applied for a grant to L. W. Armitage as administrator, during the absence of the administrator, N. Learoyd, from England.

HANNEN, P.—Is there not a difficulty in proving his absence from England if you do not know where he is? Would it not be better to revoke the grant and make it to someone else, as was done in In re Jenkins, 3 Phill. Ecc. 33, where the creditor had satisfied his own debt and gone away, and the grant was accordingly revoked. The case had better stand over for the applicants to consider what they will do.

Nov. 29.—Bayford, Q.C., and Price now applied that the grant to N. Learoyd might be revoked, and a new grant made to the mortgagees of the policies of insurance or to Miss Bradshaw as the next of kin.

They referred to In re Jenkins, 3 Phill. Eccl. Cas. 33, and In re Hoare, 2 Sw. & Tr. p. 361 (n.), as precedents for such a course.

BUTT, J.—Excepting the fact that in the cases cited the grant was of administration with the will annexed, and here the grant was of administration only, they are on all fours with the present case, with this further addition, that here the administrator is an absconding bankrupt. On the authority of these cases, therefore, I allow the application. Probably in those cases the creditor was cited, as there is nothing to show the contrary, but it is pretty clear on the affidavits that this man is an absconding bankrupt, and out of the country, and therefore, as it would be more or less of a farce to cite such a man, I dispense with any citation. I revoke the grant to N. Learoyd, and make a new grant to the next of kin.

Grant revoked, and new grant to next of kin.

Railway company—Docks company—Meaning of words "constituted by Act of Parliament for purpose of working, &c., a railway"—Undertaking—Receiver—Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), ss. 3, 4.

By a special Act promoted and obtained by a railway company, certain articles of agreement set forth in a schedule to the Act, and made between the railway company and a docks company, were confirmed. This agreement provided (inter alia) that the docks company should construct so much of the line as passed through their land; that the docks company should, at their option, have the management of and work that part of the line; and that the management of that part of the line, if worked by the railway company, should be subject to the control of the docks company.

Prior to and apart from this special Act, the docks company had no power to construct or work a line of railway. After the passing of this special Act the docks company constructed on their land the line of railway mentioned, and worked and managed it themselves.

Held (affirming Chitty, J.), that the docks company came within the interpretation of the term "railway company" in section 3 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, and that, therefore, the court had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver and manager of the undertaking under section 4 of the Act of 1867.

Held, also, that the receivership order was not to be limited to the moneys received by the docks company in respect of the railway, but should extend to the whole undertaking of the docks company.

Appeal from a decision of Chitty, J., reported 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 322.

The East and West India Docks Co. was a company incorporated by Act of Parliament, and was formed by the amalgamation of two formerly existing incorporated companies, the East India Dock Co. and the West India Dock Co. In 1865 a special Act (28 Vict. c. cxvi.) was passed to authorize the construction by the London and Blackwall Co. of certain railways, to be called the London, Blackwall, and Millwall Extension Railway, and to authorize agreements with other companies (including the East and West India Docks Co.), with reference thereto. Section 59 of this Act provided that the Blackwall Co. and the docks company might enter into and carry into effect agreements, for the construction of the extension railway in or through the property of the docks company and for the use and working of that railway in or through the premises of the docks company. Section 60 provided that certain articles of agreement between the Blackwall Co. and the docks company, dated the 25th of March, 1865, and set forth in the schedule to the Act, should be confirmed, but might be altered or modified as those companies should mutually agree. The articles of agreement provided that the docks company should, on receiving three months' notice from the railway company, at their own cost proceed to make so much of the extension railway as passed through any of their lands or property; that so much of the line, when made, should remain the absolute property of the docks company, subject to such rights of user by the railway company as thereinafter provided; that the docks company should, at their option, if they should think fit, have the management of and work so much of the line as should pass through or over their lands and property. The railway company were to pay rent to the docks company for the land of the latter company on which the line should be constructed. Under the provisions of this Act and agreement and some subsequent amending Acts, the extension line had been constructed and was being worked for public traffic, the docks company having constructed, maintained, and worked that portion of the line which was on their own land, and having rolling stock of their own.

Edward Clark, a judgment creditor of the docks company, presented a petition under section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), for the appointment of a receiver and manager of the general undertaking of the docks company to receive the tolls and sums of money arising upon or out of that undertaking.

The question raised was whether or not the docks company was a "railway company," within the meaning of section 3 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, which section provides: "The term 'company' means a railway company—that is to say, a company constituted by Act of Parliament, or by certificate under Act of Parliament, for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, or working a railway (either alone or in conjunction with any other purpose)."

Section 4 of the same Act provides that the rolling stock and plant of a railway company shall not, after their railway is open for public traffic, be liable to be taken in execution after the passing of the Act, under a judgment recovered in an action or a contract entered into after the passing of the Act, or in any action not on a contract commenced after the passing of the Act; but the person who has recovered the judgment "may obtain the appointment of a receiver, and, if necessary, of a manager of the undertaking of the company" on application by petition to the Court of Chancery, and all money received by the receiver or manager shall, after due provision for working expenses, be applied, under the direction of the court, in payment of the debts of the company and otherwise according to the rights and priorities of the persons for the time being interested therein.

On the hearing of the petition Chitty, J., made an order appointing a receiver and manager of the general undertaking of the docks company.

The London and Blackwall Railway Co., and Messrs. Kirk & Randall, contractors for the docks company, who were creditors of the docks company, and had been served with the petition under order 30 of the orders made under the Railway Companies Act, 1867, appealed.

Byrne, Q.C., and Farwell, for the appellants.—The powers conferred by the Act of 1865 on the docks company as to this railway were only conferred for the purpose of protecting its own property. The Act of 1865 was not an Act constituting the docks company a railway company. No deposit was required from the docks company, and no obligation as to non-abandonment of the line was imposed by the Legislature as a matter of bargain between them and the docks company. The docks company might at any time, by agreement with the Blackwall Railway Co., rescind the agreement entered into and cease working the railway, and that fact shows that the docks company is not a railway company. If a railway company, they should have held Wharncliffe meetings. The undertaking is the undertaking authorized by the special Act of 1865, and is, therefore, the undertaking of the London and Blackwall Railway Co., and that is the only company liable for penalties. The whole special Act of 1865 is obviously a railway Act for the benefit of the London and Blackwall Co., and not for the docks company; though the docks company had the option of working and managing that part of the line passing through their land, it was as agents for the Blackwall Co. The case of Great Northern Railway Co. v. Tahourdin, 32 W. R. 559, 13 Q. B. D.

320, is distinguishable, because the docks company there was incorporated for the very purpose (inter alia) of constructing a railway, and the special Acts were "constituting Acts" of the company, by which a bargain was made with the Legislature in order to get compulsory powers to carry out the purpose of constructing the railway.

Romer, Q.C., and Kirby, for the respondent Clark.—There is nothing in the definition of the term "railway company" in the Act of 1867 to confine it to a company whose exclusive purpose is the construction of a railway. "Constituted" means constituted for all or any of its purposes, and cannot be limited to the purposes contained in the original special Act. [COTTON, L.J.—We need not trouble you to argue as to the meaning of the term "undertaking."]

Latham, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and Pollard, for the docks company.—The purposes for which the docks company are constituted have been increased from time to time, and the constitution of the company cannot be narrowed to the purposes for which it was originally created. If a company is empowered to apply its funds for the construction and working of a railway it is a railway company within the meaning of section 3 of the Act of 1867: Taylor v. Directors of Chichester, &c., Railway Co., L. R. 4 H. L. 628, 19 W. R. H. L. Dig. 16.

Latham, Q.C., and Arbuthnot, for the Bank of England, who were mortgagees.

Kenyon Parker, for the Guardian Assurance Co., another mortgagee.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and W. Ford, for the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Co., and Butcher, for the London and Tilbury Lighterage Co.

Byrne, Q.C., in reply.—The true construction of section 3 cannot depend on whether the power given is exercised or not. The agreement between the docks company and the Blackwall Co. might have been rescinded before anything was done. The argument on the other side is that the words "constituted by Act of Parliament" are equivalent to "authorized or empowered by Act of Parliament," but the word "constituted" is used, and that shows it must be part of the fundamental constitution of the company to construct and work a railway.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Chitty, J., appointing a receiver over the undertaking of the East and West India Docks Co., under section 4 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 127. Two points have been raised: (1) whether there was jurisdiction to make any order at all; and (2) whether the order made is too extensive as to the property comprised in it. The question whether the court has jurisdiction turns on the language of section 3 of the Act of 1867. The docks company is a company formed by the amalgamation of two older companies incorporated years before, but the amalgamated company is the one dealt with in the Act of 1865. The docks company has made and works under that Act a piece of railway which is not a mere private siding, but forms part of a public railway from the London and Blackwall Railway to the bank of the River Thames, and they did this under the authority conferred by the Act of 1865 and a subsequent Act of 1879. But for the Act of 1865 the docks company could not have made this railway; the making of it was not within the purposes for which up to that time the docks company was constituted. It is true that the Act of 1865 was obtained, not by the docks company, but by the Blackwall Co. But that is immaterial. Section 3 of the Act of 1867 does not say "constituted by its Act of Parliament," but "constituted by Act of Parliament." Even if the Act of 1865 was passed without the shareholders of the dock company being previously consulted, it was for Parliament to see whether they would confer such powers. In my opinion, the Act of 1865 is within the meaning of section 3 of the Act of 1867. Section 60 of the Act of 1865 gives Parliamentary sanction to the proposed agreement between the companies, and the agreement has force only by reason of its confirmation by Parliament. [The Lord Justice read the terms of the agreement above referred to and section 3 of the Act of 1867, and continued:—] Undoubtedly, the Act of 1865 empowered the docks company to make a railway, with all the consequences resulting from it, one of which was that they would become subject to all the general provisions of Acts relating to railway companies. The latter part of section 3 "either alone or in conjunction with any other purpose," is material as showing that the meaning of the term "railway company" is not necessarily limited to a company constituted for the purpose only of constructing, maintaining, or working a railway, and there is nothing in the section as to the comparative magnitude of the railway and the rest of the undertaking of the company. What is the meaning of "constituted by Act of Parliament for the purpose of constructing, &c., a railway"? It was argued that the railway must be one of the "fundamental" purposes of the company. That, if it had any meaning, must mean one of the purposes for which the company was originally formed, and it was admitted that the meaning could not be so restricted. In my opinion, the meaning of the expression is this—if there is a company which depends for its constitution upon an Act of Parliament, and if one of its powers is that of constructing, maintaining, or working a railway, it is a railway company within the Act. It is true that an Act of Parliament does not require or compel a company to make a railway, it only gives the company power to do so. If a company, which had power to make a railway, had not made any, and had no rolling stock, the court might exercise its discretion by declining to appoint a receiver; and in the present case if the agreement were rescinded, though the company would still be within the definition "railway company," it might be that the court, though having jurisdiction, would decline to appoint a receiver; but in the present case the company had made a railway and was working it, and had rolling stock, and, in my opinion, there was power to make the order. Then is the order too extensive in its terms? In my opinion it is not. Section 4 of the Act of 1867 no doubt deprives a judgment creditor of a right he would otherwise have to take the rolling stock in execution, but it gives larger rights in compensation, and there is nothing in it to restrict the words "undertaking of the company" to property connected with the railway. The words, in my opinion, include that which the company is, by its constitution and the effect of all its Acts of Parliament, authorized to undertake and to do, and there is no reason why the appointment of a receiver and manager should be limited to any part of the property of this company. The order is a consequence of the company being within the Act.

As to some of the persons appearing on this appeal, they must be taken to have done so gratis, as they did in the court below.

FRY, L.J.—The judgment appealed from is, in my opinion, plainly right. This company is authorized by the special Act of 1865 to construct and work a railway, and by implication to maintain it. No doubt this authority has not been given in the usual way, for it was given in an Act introduced by the Blackwall Railway Co. But the agreement referred to is sanctioned by statute, and therefore the result is, that authority is given by statute to the docks company to make and work the railway. New powers, which they had not originally, have therefore been given to the docks company. That being the position of the docks company we must look to the Act of 1867, and see if this is a "company constituted by Act of Parliament . . . for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, or working a railway." There are two possible constructions of this expression. First, it might be urged, though it has not been in fact urged, that the expression has reference to the original constitution of a company. Such an argument could not have prevailed, because the constitution of a company may from time to time vary, like the constitution of a country. How do we find the purposes for which a company is constituted a railway company? All Acts of Parliament have defined the powers of a railway company by giving them powers —by clothing them with power—to construct, work, and maintain a railway; and here the docks company is so empowered.

It was urged that the special Act of 1865 was not promoted by the docks company, and therefore that the docks company was not a railway company within the meaning of the Act of 1867. But why should it be necessary that the special Act should have been promoted by the docks company? In my opinion we are not at liberty to add a qualification to the definition of the term "railway company" given in the statute, which would have the effect of narrowing the statutory definition. The Legislature has not required that the statute giving the powers to construct and work a railway should be a statute promoted by the company to whom the powers are given, or be mainly concerned with the affairs of that company. The same remark applies to the argument as to Wharncliffe meetings.

Then it was said that the purpose of constructing and working a railway must be the primary or fundamental purpose. But the words of the statute itself, "either alone or in conjunction with any other purpose," seem to negative that. In my opinion this case comes within and satisfies all the requirements of the words in section 3 of the Act of 1867.

Furthermore, it appears to me the nature of this company brings it within the mischief which the statute seeks to prevent—viz., the seizure of its rolling stock by a single judgment creditor, which would be a matter of inconvenience to the public and seriously injure the company.

As to the objection that the receiver should be limited to the railway part of the undertaking, the answer to that is that the language of section 4 of the Act of 1867 is plain, and applies to the whole undertaking of the company.

LOPES, L.J.—If the language in section 3 of the Act of 1867 is intended to cover a case like this, all I can say is, that it seems to me very unfortunate language to use for that purpose. However, as the other members of the court agree in considering that this company comes within the definition in section 3, I do not dissent from their opinion.

I am glad that this conclusion has been arrived at, because I think the case of this company is within the mischief intended to be dealt with by the section. I agree with the construction put by the rest of the court on section 4 of the Act, as to the extent of the receivership order.

GUARDIANS OF MEDWAY UNION v. GUARDIANS OF BEDMINSTER UNION: (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—Irremovability—Residence for three years by wife with husband—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), ss. 34, 35.

Where a woman had resided with her husband for three years in a certain parish, and continued to reside there for three months after his death,

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court, ante, p. 478, 20 Q. B. D. 191) (Lopes L.J., dissenting), that she must be deemed to be settled in that parish under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Hawkins, J.), reported ante, p. 478, 20 Q. B. D. 191.

An order of justices having been made for the removal to the Medway Union as the place of her last legal settlement of Caroline Baker, widow, with her three children, it was confirmed by the Recorder of Bristol, subject to a special case.

It appeared that Caroline Baker had resided in the parish of Gillingham, in the Medway Union, continuously, together with her husband, for upwards of three years immediately before his death, which took place in March, 1886, and that she had continued to reside in that parish as a widow for three months after the death of her husband. The Divisional Court were of opinion that she had thereby acquired a settlement in the Medway Union under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876.

The Medway Union appealed.

By section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876: "Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would in accordance with the statutes in that behalf render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise."

By section 35: "No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another."

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Kinglake (Douglas Metcalfe with them), for the appellants.—The pauper, while under coverture, was incapable of acquiring any settlement. As a wife, she took the settlement of her husband, and could have none of her own. After her husband's death she could begin to acquire a settlement for herself, but she could not take her late husband's settlement, since "wife" in section 35 does not include widow: Croydon Union v. Reigate Union, 35 W. R. 824, 19 Q. B. D. 385.

They also cited R. v. Manchester Overseers, 30 W. R. 247, 8 Q. B. D. 50; Dorchester Union v. Poplar Union, ante, p. 706, 21 Q. B. D. 88; R. v. S. Ebbes, 12 Q. B. 137; Highworth Union v. Westbury-on-Severn Union, ante, p. 422, 20 Q. B. D. 597.

Poole, Q.C. (Cresswell Wall with him), for the respondents.—The case is governed by R. v. Inhabitants of Glossop, 12 Q. B. 117, which was followed in R. v. St. George's-in-the-East, 18 W. R. 787, L. R. 5 Q. B. 364. The pauper acquired a settlement while residing with her husband, and she does not claim a derivative settlement under section 35.

Kinglake replied.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case I can see no answer to the reasoning of Pollock, B., in the Divisional Court. In my opinion the question raised is not the same as any question decided hitherto by this court, and does not turn on any of the decisions on section 35. It is not, I think, a case of derivative settlement at all. The only question is whether this pauper was, at the time the order for her removal was made, in such a position that she came within the meaning of section 34. If the conditions set out in that section exist after the passing of that Act of Parliament then the law is that there is a settlement. In my opinion the meaning of section 34 is that if those conditions exist, then any person with regard to whom they exist shall be deemed to have, and shall, in fact, have, a settlement. Now, did those conditions exist in this case. The pauper had resided for three years in this parish with her husband. She had resided there also for three months after his death. Can her residence before her husband's death be taken into account in ascertaining the question of her irremovability? The case of R. v. Glossop is clearly in point, and it says that such residence must be taken into account. The point to be looked at is whether she was irremovable or not, and for that purpose the period during which she was under coverture may be regarded. Where a woman who is under coverture is not residing with her husband the question whether or not she is capable of acquiring a settlement of her own is a problem which may one day arise, but which is not now before us. In this case she and her husband resided together in the parish for three years. She resided in the parish, therefore, both in law and in fact, and her residence there with her husband can be taken into account in ascertaining her irremovability. During the three years that she resided in the parish with her husband she could not have been removed because he was irremovable. She therefore was irremovable, and in that respect she satisfied the conditions prescribed by section 34. After the death of her husband she continued to reside in the same parish for three months more. During that period she could not be removed, because, by law, she could not be removed for a year after her husband's death. Therefore, up to the time when this question arises the pauper had resided in this parish in the Medway Union, both in fact and in law, for more than three years, "in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the statutes in that behalf," have rendered her irremovable. She has, therefore, exactly fulfilled the conditions of section 34. Whether she would have acquired a settlement or not under such circumstances before the passing of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, is immaterial. She is now under that section deemed to be settled, and is, in my opinion, in fact settled in the Medway Union. I have adopted, therefore, the reasoning of Pollock, B., in the court below. I think that reasoning was right, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

Lindley, L.J.—I have felt some doubt during the argument, but I have come to the conclusion that this case is brought within section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. In my opinion the removability of a wife depends upon the removability of her husband, but if she resides with him in a parish in which he is irremovable, she also is irremovable, not by reason of her residence in the parish only, but by reason of his irremovability and of her residence with him. I think that is sound law, and is the true construction of the Act. The husband clearly was irremovable within the meaning of section 34, and therefore the pauper, as his wife, actually residing with him, was so also. They were, during the husband's lifetime, both irremovable. Although the section might not apply to a woman living apart from her husband, yet here, where their residence and irremovability was conjoined, it clearly does apply. Her irremovability was consequent on her residence with him in a parish where he was irremovable. She resided with him in that parish for three years before his death, and in my opinion it is immaterial that she continued to reside there for three months after it. Quite apart from section 35, this is, in my opinion, the true construction of section 34.

Lopes, L.J.—I regret to say that I find myself unable to agree with the other members of the court and with the decision in the court below. In consequence of the decision in Croydon Union v. Reigate Union, as to which I will say a word presently, I have to construe section 34 without paying any regard to section 35. I think that that is to be regretted, for, in my opinion, section 35 is of material assistance in construing section 34. In my opinion the important words of section 34 are "any person." I think those words mean "any person," sui juris, who is capable of acquiring a settlement, and do not include either unemancipated children or women who are under coverture. During the lifetime of her husband a woman, in my opinion, cannot acquire in her own right a status of irremovability. If he is removable she is also removable, and if she is irremovable it is only because her husband is irremovable. The case is entirely different from that of a widow or a feme sole, who is, of course, capable of acquiring a status of irremovability for herself. In my opinion the construction given to the section by the court below is entirely wrong, and is subversive of principles of the law of settlement which have existed for centuries.

With regard to the case of the Croydon Union v. Reigate Union, which decides that "wife" does not include widow, I loyally bow to that decision, but as I understand that that case is under appeal to the House of Lords, I feel justified in saying that if the matter had been res integra I could not have put such a construction upon the words of the section.

Bridgetown Waterworks Co. v. Barbados Water Supply Co. (a.)

Practice — Defence — Further defence — Confession of further defence — Judgment for costs — Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 24, rr. 2, 3.

In an action for an injunction, the defendants, after delivering their statement of defence, delivered a further defence, setting forth a ground of defence arising after the delivery of their statement of defence. The plaintiffs thereupon delivered a confession of the further defence, and signed judgment for costs up to the time of the defendants pleading the further defence.

The defendants did not intend, by pleading the further defence, to waive their first defence, which they alleged included the point raised by their further defence.

Held, on motion by the defendants to set aside the judgment for costs, that, the defendants consenting that their further defence be struck out, the judgment for costs should be discharged.

Motion.

The plaintiffs were a company incorporated in Barbadoes under a local Act. The defendants were a company incorporated in England under the Companies Acts.

The action was brought in June, 1887, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying on certain works in Barbadoes so as to interfere with the plaintiffs' supply of water.

The defendants, on the 11th of August, 1887, delivered a statement of defence, by which they alleged that they were acting under powers given them by the Barbadoes Water Supply Act, 1886; and, on the 9th of December, 1887, they, by leave of the court, delivered a further statement of defence, setting up a defence which had arisen after the delivery of their statement of defence—viz., that by a local Act, assented to in November, 1887, it was provided that the Barbadoes Water Supply Act, 1886, should apply to them as if they had been duly incorporated before the passing of the Act of 1886.

The plaintiffs then, on the 6th of April, 1888, under ord. 24, r. 3, delivered a confession of the further defence, and signed judgment for costs up to the time of pleading the further defence.

This was a motion by the defendants for an order setting aside the judgment for costs.

The Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 24, provide, by rule 2, "Where any ground of defence arises after the defendant has delivered a statement of defence, or after the time limited for his doing so has expired, the defendant may . . . within eight days after such ground of defence has arisen, or at any subsequent time by leave of the court or a judge, deliver a further defence . . . setting forth the same."

And by rule 3, "Whenever any defendant, in his statement of defence, or in any further statement of defence as in the rule last mentioned, alleges any ground of defence which has arisen after the commencement of the action, the plaintiff may deliver a confession of such defence, and may thereupon sign judgment for his costs up to the time of the pleading of such defence, unless the court or a judge shall, either before or after the delivery of such confession, otherwise order."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and George Henderson, for the defendants.—In this case the first statement of defence of the defendants is good, and includes the point raised by the further statement, and they do not intend to waive it. The second defence is simply an additional defence founded on a declaratory statute subsequently passed. The defendants ought not to pay costs simply because, while having a good defence at first, they also set up the additional defence. They are entitled to both defences, but, if necessary, are ready to waive their further defence in order that the judgment for costs may be set aside: ord. 24, r. 3; Harrison v. Marquis of Abergavenny, W. N., 1887, p. 156.

Christopher James, for the plaintiffs.—As the defendants have set up a ground of defence which has arisen since the delivery of their statement of defence, the plaintiffs, who have delivered a confession of the further defence, are entitled to judgment for their costs according to the terms of the order.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

North, J.—I cannot make the order asked for while the further defence stands, but, if that is withdrawn, I think it is a case in which I can "otherwise order." It is clear that it is not intended by the further statement of defence to waive the defence set forth in the original statement of defence. The defendants do not admit that their first defence was bad, and that they have set up for the first time a good statement of defence. It is clear that order 24 contemplates that there may be circumstances which would make it unfair that the defendant should pay the costs when he puts in a further defence arising after his first defence was delivered.

I do not think that the plaintiffs ought to have the judgment for costs, or, on the other hand, that I ought to take away from them the benefit of having signed judgment for costs, and allow the defendants the benefit of their further defence. The right thing is that neither the judgment for costs nor the further defence should stand. If the first defence raises the point made by the further defence the defendants will have the benefit of the latter at the trial. The order will be that, the defendants consenting that the further defence be struck out, the judgment for costs be discharged. The costs of the further defence, the signing judgment for costs, and this motion will be reserved.

In re Norwich Town Close Estate. (a.)

The freemen of the city of Norwich had, at the trial of an action against the corporation of that town, obtained a declaration that the corporation was seised of the Town Close in trust for the freemen; but the judge, though declining to order a scheme to be settled, prefaced the order made at the trial of the action with a declaration that it was "without prejudice to any other proceedings that might be taken by the Attorney-General." On a summons being taken out by the Attorney-General under section 48 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, for a scheme to be settled.

Held, that the Act only applied where a charitable trust existed, and gave no jurisdiction to decide on summons whether this was so or not.

Adjourned summons.

An action (Stanley v. Mayor, &c., of Norwich and Others, 31 Solicitors' Journal, 348) was brought by one T. J. Stanley and others, on behalf of themselves and all others the freemen of the city of Norwich, against the corporation of that city and the Attorney-General, claiming (inter alia) a declaration that the corporation was seised of the Town Close Estate in the county of the city of Norwich (containing about 100 acres), and the rents and profits thereof, in trust for the freemen of the said city.

Counsel for the Attorney-General contended at the trial that there was a charitable trust, and asked that a scheme might be settled.

Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration claimed, but declined to order a scheme to be settled, though he prefaced the judgment by a declaration that it was "without prejudice to any other proceedings that might be taken by the defendant, her Majesty's Attorney-General, in that behalf."

This was a summons issued by the Attorney-General under section 28 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, intituled "In the matter of the Norwich Town Close Estate Charity and in the matter of the Charitable Trusts Acts, 1853 to 1859," asking that a scheme might be settled.

Section 28 of the Act, so far as material, is in these terms:—"Where . . . any . . . order or direction relating to any charity . . . shall be considered desirable, and such . . . order or direction might now be made or given by the Court of Chancery

. . . it shall be lawful for the Attorney-General to make application (without any information, bill, or petition) . . . for such order, direction, or relief as the nature of the case may require, and the Master of the Rolls or the Vice-Chancellor to whom any such application shall be made shall and may proceed upon and dispose of such application, . . . and shall and may have and exercise thereupon all such jurisdiction, power, and authority and make such orders and give such directions . . . as might now be exercised, made, or given by the Court of Chancery . . . in a suit regularly instituted or upon petition as the case may require."

Ingle-Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—This is a case in which the Act applies, and a scheme should be settled.

Warmington, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the freemen of the city of Norwich.—In the case of an analagous statute, Lord Romilly's Act, the decisions in In re Dean Clarke's Charity, 8 Sim. 34, and In re Manchester New College, 1 W. R. 269, 16 Beav. 610, show that there is no jurisdiction under that Act (and the one now under discussion is similar in language and scope) to decide whether there actually is a charity or not. There must, in fact, be a charity existent before this Act applies. The case of Ex parte Rees, 3 Ves. & Beames, 10, points in the same direction. Moreover, this is a statutory jurisdiction conferred on the courts, and must be strictly confined within the limits laid down by the Act creating it.

Ingle-Joyce in reply.—The sole question is whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs in the original suit (the respondents here) can now say that the trust then established is not a charitable one. The Act gives all the powers to the court that it would have had in a suit: In re Davenport Charities, 4 De G. M. & G. 839, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 14.

P. H. Lawrance, for the mayor and aldermen, submitted to act as the court should direct.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 14.—Kekewich, J.—The main question is whether the establishment of a charity or of a charitable trust is within the scope of the Act of 1853. It is intituled an Act for Administration of Charitable Trusts, and the preamble adds to that object the more beneficial application of charitable funds. What is charitable is not defined, but it may be treated as equivalent to belonging to a charity, and one finds a definition of charity in section 66, which must be read in connection with section 48 of the Act of 1855. There is no occasion to criticise this definition further than to say that it obviously does not advance the determination of the question before me, while it opens a new one which need not be pursued—namely, whether the property with which this case is concerned falls within the language there employed. Unassisted by definition, I have to consider the language of the Act and its intent and purpose generally.

Respecting by far the larger number of institutions possibly falling within its scope, no doubt exists whether they are charitable or not, and the Act seems drafted on the assumption that this would invariably be the case. And it might well be held that the remedial character and extent of the Act cannot properly be narrowed by an issue whether the particular application refers to charity or not, unless raised on substantial ground. If, however, section 28 applies to a given property or institution, other sections of the same Act are generally applicable to it, and other powers would be exercisable in connection with what never has been, and possibly never may be, determined to be a charity. I observe, also, that by the Act of 1860 the Commissioners have all the powers given to the court by the Act of 1853, and though there are safeguards against such an exercise of jurisdiction, they might be called on to decide whether there is a charity in such a case as the present. The real question between the Attorney-General and the Norwich freemen—viz., whether there is a charity to be administered—is of some difficulty. No one could gainsay that, especially having regard to Goodman v. Mayor of Saltash, 31 W. R. 293, 7 App. Cas. 633. One would not easily assume that it was the intention of the Legislature that a question like that should be determined on an application for the settlement of a scheme made under an enactment expressly directed to administration only. In my judgment the tenour of the Act is much adverse to such a conclusion. I do not think that much, if any, assistance can be derived from section 41. If the Attorney is right the Norwich freemen are no less cestuis que trustent than if he is wrong, and they cannot be treated as persons holding or claiming property adversely to the charity.

The authorities are of little use. Two only were cited by Mr. Warmington, and I need not refer to others which are mentioned in the reports of those two. They all arose under Sir John Romilly's Act, which may fairly be referred to as analogous to that of 1853, and is expressed in language of certainly not less extensive application. In the case of In re Dean Clarke's Charity there was no doubt whatever of the existence of a charity, the trustees whereof were petitioners, and the question was whether the conflicting claims of respondents could properly be decided on petition. In the Manchester New College case the Master of the Rolls considered a petition proper because there were no conflicting interests. The case was really cited for the remarks on the comparative advantages and disadvantages of summary proceedings, which I do not think it necessary further to discuss. There was cited on the other side the case of In re Davenport's Charities, but that only deals with the narrow question whether the provision in the Act of 1853, for the appointment of new trustees, was exercisable in a case of lunacy. To the Trustee Acts, as somewhat analogous, one naturally turns on such a question as this. I humbly venture to think that the jurisdiction conferred by those Acts might probably, and with advantage, have been construed to extend to many cases decided not to fall within it; but the rule has been laid down, and has been strictly followed, that it is necessary first to find a trust declared by will, contract, or judicial decision before the provisions of the Act can be called into operation. In re Cumming, 18 W. R. 157, 5 Ch. App. 72, establishes an exception from this rule of executed contracts, but the exception serves to illustrate the extent and rigour of the rule itself. The analogy ought not to be scarcely pressed, but so far as it holds good it is in favour of a liberal construction of the Acts here in question. The result is that I must sustain the objection taken by the respondents to the Attorney-General's application, and hold that before issuing a summons under the Acts for the settlement of a scheme for the regulation and management of the alleged charity he must establish, by independent proceedings, that there is a charity to be regulated. The summons is intituled, and necessarily so intituled, as to assume the existence of a charity and applicability of the Act to the Town Close Estate. It is just that which cannot be assumed, in my judgment, be determined in this proceeding.

Q. B. Div. (Manisty and Stephen, JJ.) June 13.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE. (a.)

Local government—Licence—Forfeiture—Transfer—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 15—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), ss. 8, 19.

Where the holder of a licence had been convicted of an offence under section 15 of the Licensing Act, 1872, the justices refused the application of a new tenant for a renewal, and of the landlord for a transfer.

Held, that the justices were entitled to do so, as the licence had become forfeited, and that section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, did not apply.

Rule calling upon the justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire and the justices of Halifax to show cause why a certiorari should not issue to remove into the Queen's Bench Division, for the purpose of quashing, an order made at a special licensing sessions for the borough of Halifax on the 3rd of February, refusing to transfer the licence of a certain beerhouse, and also an order of quarter sessions confirming the same. The facts of the case were as follows:—

On the 13th of December, 1887, the holder of the licence of the beerhouse in question was convicted of using the premises as a brothel. Before the hearing of the case a person whom the landlord had agreed to accept as a new tenant for the premises asked to have his application heard for a transfer of the licence. The justices decided to hear first the case against the then holder of the licence. After the conviction the justices refused the application of the new tenant. On the 16th of December the landlord applied for a transfer of the licence, and the hearing was adjourned till the 3rd of February to the special licensing sessions, when the application of the landlord was also refused, and his refusal was confirmed on appeal to the quarter sessions.

Walton, for the landord, having obtained a rule.

Patterson, for the justices.—The licence was forfeited under the 15th section of the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94). The landlord asked the justices to grant a transfer under the Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 15, but the justices rightly held that this case did not come under that section, and that the landlord could not get a transfer where the tenant had been convicted of the misdemeanour here proved. The Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), s. 19, only applies to a going licence. [He was stopped.]

Walton, in support of the rule.—Sections 8 and 19 of the Act of 1869 were intended to protect the owners of licensed property in possession of such at the time of the passing of the Act. [MANISTY, J., referred to Reg. v. Overton, 21 W. R. 887; Hargreaves v. Dawson, 24 L. T. N. S. 428, 19 W. R. C. L. Dig. 11; Reg. v. Liverpool Justices, 32 W. R. 20, 11 Q. B. D. 638.] The licence was capable of transfer under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14.

MANISTY, J.—This is a rule calling on the justices of Halifax to shew cause why a certiorari should not issue to remove into this court an order made at a special licensing sessions refusing to transfer the licence of a beerhouse, and an order of quarter sessions made in confirmation of that order. The facts are that this house had been licensed from May, 1869, continuously to some time before the first application was made to the justices in December, 1887, and the question is whether the justices were right in holding that the 19th section of the Act of 1869 is not applicable to the case.

On the 13th of December the person intending to take over the house came before the justices to make an application for the transfer. It was then stated to the magistrates that there was a case in their list with reference to the house, and the justices decided to hear that case first. They proceeded to do so, and convicted the tenant then in occupation of an offence by which his licence was forfeited. The application of the new tenant was refused by the justices, and a special licensing sessions refused an application of the landlord for a transfer of the licence, on the ground that no licence was then in force. I think that the justices were right, and that it was intended by the Legislature that if a licence became forfeited on a conviction for such an offence, the magistrates might refuse a new licence unfettered by section 8 of the Act of 1869. The licence was forfeited on the conviction, and the hearing of the application for a renewal of the licence really came on for hearing for the first time on the 3rd of February.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. As I read the 19th section of the Act of 1869 it is not applicable to this case, because before the application on the 3rd of February to the licensing sessions the original licence had been forfeited.

BLACKBURN, LOW, & CO. v. HASLAM. (a.)

Marine insurance—Concealment of material fact—Principal and agent—Negotiation for effecting policy commenced by agent but completed by principal—Concealment by agent who commenced negotiation.

The plaintiffs, being the insurers of an overdue vessel, instructed Messrs. R. & Co., brokers at Glasgow, to effect a re-insurance. Messrs. R. & Co. accordingly telegraphed to Messrs. T. & Co., brokers in London, to effect such re-insurance at a premium of fifteen guineas. Before any answer from Messrs. T. & Co. arrived, M., one of the partners in the firm of R. & Co., obtained information of a fact material to the risk. On the arrival of an answer from T. & Co., asking for an advance of premium, R. & Co. informed the plaintiffs thereof, but did not disclose to the plaintiffs the information obtained by M. The plaintiffs replied that the premium might be raised to twenty guineas. R. & Co. then telegraphed in the plaintiffs' name to T. & Co. that they might pay twenty guineas. T. & Co. telegraphed in reply direct to the plaintiffs that there was no chance under twenty-five guineas. The plaintiffs then telegraphed to T. & Co. that they might pay twenty-five guineas. Upon this T. & Co., through the agency of another firm of brokers, effected a policy of re-insurance with the defendant.

Held, that, as the policy was the result of one entire negotiation, conducted up to a certain point through the agency of R. & Co., though afterwards carried on by the principals themselves without further intervention on the part of R. & Co., the non-communication of M.'s knowledge vitiated the policy.

Motion to set aside a verdict and judgment for the defendant and to enter judgment for the plaintiffs, or for a new trial.

The plaintiffs sued the defendant on a policy of re-insurance, claiming for a total loss by perils of the sea. The substantial defence was that the defendant was induced to subscribe the policy by the wrongful concealment by the plaintiffs and their agents of certain material facts known to the plaintiffs or their agents and unknown to the defendant.

The following statement of the facts of the case is taken from the written judgment of Pollock, B. :—

This is an action upon a policy on the hull and machinery of the ship State of Florida, underwritten by the defendants for £800. At the trial, which took place before Day, J., and a special jury of London, it was proved that Messrs. Blackburn, Low, & Co., who were underwriters and insurance brokers at Glasgow, insured the steamer State of Florida for £1,500 from New York to Glasgow. She left New York on the 11th of April, 1884, and was due at Glasgow about the 25th of April. Upon the 1st of May Messrs. Blackburn, Low, & Co., being desirous of covering their liability, instructed Messrs. Rose, Murison, & Thomson, another firm of insurance brokers at Glasgow, to effect a re-insurance upon The State of Florida for £1,500. Acting upon these instructions Messrs. Rose & Co., at 11.29 a.m. telegraphed to their agents, Messrs. Rose, Thomson, Young, & Co., who were insurance brokers in London, as follows :—"Blackburn, Low, wish to reduce Florida lines; cover for them £1,500 at 15 guineas net." In reply to this they received a telegram, sent at 12.35, and received at 1, from Messrs. Rose, Thomson, Young, & Co. :—"State Florida 20 guineas paying freely and market very stiff, likely to advance before day is out." Up to midday nothing was known either by Blackburn, Low, & Co. or Rose, Murison, & Thomson of The State of Florida except that she was overdue. About 12.30 Mr. Murison, a partner in the firm of Rose, Murison, & Thomson, had an interview with the manager of the State Line Co., who owned The State of Florida, and he informed Mr. Murison in confidence that his directors in London had received intelligence that The City of Rome steamer, on her way to Liverpool, had seen a vessel having on board some of the shipwrecked crew of The State of Florida. Upon receiving the last telegram, at 1 p.m., Messrs. Rose & Co. communicated its contents to Messrs. Blackburn, Low, & Co., who said they might pay 20 guineas. Mr. Murison considered that, as he had received the intelligence about the shipwrecked crew in confidence, he was not entitled to communicate it to Messrs. Blackburn, Low, & Co.; but afterwards, at 1.19, he telegraphed in Blackburn, Low, & Co.'s name to Rose, Thomson, Young, & Co. :—"Florida pay 20 guineas." In reply to this the latter firm, at 2.14, telegraphed direct to Blackburn, Low, & Co. :—"State Florida market now worked out at 20 guineas; no chance under 25 guineas, and for to-day only." This was received by Blackburn, Low, & Co. at 2.29, and at 3.2 they replied :—"State Florida, if you cannot do better, pay 25 guineas and wire instanter." To this Messrs. Rose, Thomson, Young, & Co. replied, at 4.37 :—"State Florida done £800 at 25 guineas; no chance more to-day under 30 guineas." As the negotiations for this insurance were not completed by Messrs. Rose, Murison, & Thomson, they did not charge any commission to the plaintiffs. After the receipt of the last telegram Messrs. Thomson, Young, & Co. communicated with another London broker, who effected the insurance in question with the defendants, and they, upon becoming acquainted with the above facts, declined to pay.

At the conclusion of the case Day, J., after calling the attention of the jury to the material facts, directed them as follows :—"Now the question I leave to you is, first of all, Were Rose, Murison, & Thomson employed to effect an insurance? I do not mean whether their authority was limited to the insurance of fifteen guineas, the first telegram, because they were afterwards, as we know, authorized to go to twenty guineas; but were they generally authorized to act on behalf of the plaintiff? The next question is, Was this insurance effected through their agency? I think it will make it abundantly clear if I substitute for "their" the word "that," and relieve it of all possible ambiguity. Was this particular insurance effected through that agency? Who introduced the London firm? Rose, Thomson, Young, & Co. it is true, are the people who go and see the underwriters in London, it may be still acting as the correspondents and agents of Rose & Co., of Glasgow. Was it effected through that agency? Did Rose & Co. of Glasgow, put the matter in the hands of Rose & Co. of London, for the purpose of carrying out the insurance effected through their agency? Was it all one negotiation, or was it really taken out of the hands of Rose & Co. of Glasgow, and put into the hands of the plaintiffs, irrespective of Rose & Co. of Glasgow? Was it taken out of their hands and, as it were, a new negotiation commenced, or was the policy effected in pursuance of the original agency? Was it all one transaction or not? That is what I substantially mean by the question I put to you. In the second place, Was the insurance effected through that agency?" The jury found a verdict in the affirmative as to both questions, and the learned judge thereupon directed that a verdict and judgment should be entered for the defendant, with costs.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Hollams, for the plaintiffs.—This case cannot be distinguished from Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors, ante, p. 449, 12 App. Cas. 531, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. The policy here sued upon was not effected through the agency of Rose, Murison, & Thomson, but through the agency of Rose, Thomson, Young, & Co. and neither the plaintiffs nor Rose, Thomson, Young, & Co. had any knowledge of the concealed fact. When Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors was before the Court of Appeal, Lord Esher, M.R., said that the authority given by Blackburn, Low, & Co. to Rose, Murison, & Thomson "lasted until the plaintiff was put into direct communication with Rose, Thomson, Young, & Co., when it of course ceased." The last step which Rose, Murison, & Thomson took in the matter was the sending the telegram in the plaintiff's name which authorized the London firm to insure at twenty guineas. But this authority was never acted upon; and in the result the plaintiffs gave the London firm a different authority—viz., to insure at twenty-five guineas; and it was under that authority that the present policy was effected. The summing up of the learned judge was faulty and ambiguous. The view of the ultimate contract being built up on the old negotiation is misleading. It might have been equally so built up if there had been an express revocation of the original authority. There is no evidence of a general authority to Rose, Murison, & Thomson to effect an insurance. The proper question to have left to the jury was, Who effected this insurance? And the only answer was, The London firm. Neither Day, J., in this case nor any of the lords in Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors thought there was any obligation on Mr. Murison to communicate his knowledge. The reasoning of the lords in that case applies equally to this case.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and J. G. Barnes, Q.C., for the defendant.—The learned judge properly drew the attention of the jury to the question whether there was a new and independent negotiation, or whether the contract sued on was built on the old negotiation. And the jury rightly found that it was not a new negotiation. This finding establishes the difference between Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors and the present case. In that case the policy sued on was effected through the agency of Roxburgh, Currie, & Co. quite independently of Rose, Murison, & Thomson. Here the policy sued on was effected through the agency of Rose, Murison, & Thomson. It is true they employed sub-agents; but that did not prevent the whole negotiation being one transaction. The mere alteration of the rate of premium did not constitute a new and independent instruction.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 4.—POLLOCK, B., read the judgment of the court (POLLOCK, B., and CHARLES, J.), which, after stating the facts as above, proceeded as follows:—

The plaintiffs moved that this verdict and judgment should be set aside, and that judgment might be entered for the plaintiffs, or a new trial had, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the learned judge at the trial ought to have directed the jury that Rose, Murison, & Thomson were not the agents of the plaintiffs to effect the insurance in question, and that the non-communication of material information within the knowledge of Rose, Murison, & Thomson, but not known to the plaintiffs or their brokers, was not a concealment which would affect the policy, and ought to have directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs upon the facts proved or admitted at the trial. These questions are so closely connected that the better mode of dealing with them will be to consider whether, taken as a whole, the true conclusion of law and fact has been arrived at. For this purpose it will be convenient to follow the events in order of time. Starting with the telegram of the 1st of May, 11.29 a.m., there can be no doubt that when that was sent Messrs. Rose, Murison, & Thomson were agents for Messrs. Blackburn, Low, & Co. to effect the insurance proposed thereby, and that any knowledge by them of facts material to the risk would be equivalent to a knowledge by their principals, and would vitiate any insurance based upon such proposal. Up to this time, however, both principals and agents were ignorant of any such facts. Before any further step was taken Rose, Murison, & Co. became aware of the report brought by The City of Rome. They therefore determined to go no further with the matter in their own names; but, having received the intelligence in confidence, they did not communicate it to Messrs. Blackburn, Low, & Co. What they did was this. Having previously obtained the authority of Blackburn, Low, & Co. to go as far as twenty guineas, they telegraphed in Blackburn, Low, & Co.'s own name to the London brokers, who answered direct to Blackburn, Low, & Co. that there was no chance under twenty-five guineas; upon which Blackburn, Low, & Co. telegraphed back "Pay twenty-five guineas," and upon this the policy in question was effected by the London brokers through the agency of another firm of brokers.

Under these circumstances it is clear that up to the time when Messrs. Rose, Murison, & Co. received the last telegram addressed to themselves they were the agents for the plaintiffs to effect not merely a re-insurance, but the particular re-insurance which the plaintiffs had ordered—viz., upon the ship State of Florida for £1,500; and that any knowledge possessed by them which was material to the risk would be equivalent to a knowledge by the plaintiffs themselves. It seems to be equally clear that, the agents being incapacitated from continuing the negotiation, in the sense that no valid policy could be founded upon it, they could not put themselves in a better position by telegraphing in the name of their principals instead of their own name. Having so telegraphed, and the answer having been sent to the principals, what is the position of the latter? That they might have effected a valid policy by a fresh and independent negotiation carried on through another agent is established by the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors, and for the purposes of this case it may be further conceded that the principals might themselves have opened a new and independent negotiation with the brokers in London by giving a fresh order for the policy. This, however, was not done. Messrs. Blackburn, Low, & Co. merely telegraphed to Rose, Thomson, Young, & Co. — "State Florida, if you cannot do better, pay 25 guineas," and upon the basis of this telegram the negotiation continues. The offer is put forward at the increased premium; this is accepted, and the policy in question is signed.

Upon this state of facts the question arises, Was the original negotiation given up and a new and distinct negotiation entered upon, or was it a mere handing over by the agents to their principals of an existing negotiation, in order that the principals might take it up at the point where the agents left off and continue it until it resulted in a contract? This is practically the question which was left by Day, J., to the jury, and they have found that the latter is the true view of what occurred.

In considering their finding it is important to remember that the only instructions as to the name of the ship and the amount to be insured were those contained in the first telegram from the Glasgow agents to the London agents. Without these no proposal could have been forwarded. They are never mentioned again by the plaintiffs, and the effect is the same as if each telegram had reiterated all that had gone before. This also affords an answer to one of the arguments pressed on behalf of the plaintiffs. A merchant, it was said, who sends his agent into a market on Monday with a limited authority as to price, is not prohibited from going into the same market on Tuesday and bidding higher by reason of his agent having acquired some information, such as that the goods were stolen, which would prevent any bargain which he might make resulting in a valid contract. But the reason of this is that the principal in the supposed case only employed the agent pro hac vice on the Monday, and when he himself went into the market on Tuesday he commenced independent operations in no way based upon the earlier exertions of his agent. In the present case the name of the vessel, the amount to be insured, and the whole object of the bargaining were the same, and the only change was in the advanced premium; so that the plaintiffs not merely continued a negotiation begun by their agents, but they availed themselves of it by using and adopting what they had done up to a certain point. It is truly said, no doubt, that, when once the agents ceased to negotiate, their authority was at an end; but this leaves untouched the position that the negotiation was handed over to the principals to complete, and that the London brokers were entitled to treat the matter as one entire transaction. It was also urged that the negotiation was not vitiated by the fact that the principals made use of the information as to the name of the ship and the amount of the policy, as this was done merely by way of reference. Had there been no question of agency this would be true. If all that the plaintiffs had done had been to telegraph to the London agents, "Effect for me the same insurance that you have effected for A. B.," with whom the plaintiffs had had no dealings, the reference to A. B. would not vitiate the ultimate policy because A. B. had improperly withheld information which he ought to have communicated. The distinction, however, between this and adopting the previous acts of an agent and carrying out a contract in part based upon them is obvious.

While considering this part of the case with reference to the principles on which the law of concealment is founded, it is a legitimate consideration to look to what would be the probable effect of what passed upon the minds of the London agents as business men. Until they received the telegram in the plaintiffs' name they must have supposed that they were dealing with Rose, Murison, & Co., and in considering whether they would accept the offer they would be entitled to assume that Rose, Murison, & Co., whose known means of information might be a material ingredient, had received no news of the ship which they ought to have communicated. As was said by Lord Watson in Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors, "When an agent to insure is brought into contact with an insurer, the latter transacts on the footing that the agent has disclosed every material circumstance within his personal knowledge, whether it be known to his principal or not." When the matter was taken up by the plaintiffs themselves, and the further negotiations were carried on in their own name, the right of the London agents, founded upon the negotiation as a whole, to act upon the assumption referred to does not seem to have been displaced.

Another argument much urged by the plaintiffs' counsel was rested on the assertion that all that passed before the first telegram by the plaintiffs amounted merely to offers and negotiation, and that, in considering the rights of the defendants, the only question that should have been submitted to the jury was, What ought the London brokers to have communicated to the defendants or to the intermediate broker by whom the policy was ultimately procured? The answer to this is that if the negotiation by the plaintiffs and the Glasgow brokers was one and the same, as the jury have found it to be, the argument fails, because in almost all cases where a policy has been held to be avoided by reason of concealment, the concealment occurs some time before the actual policy is signed. It is the negotiation that is tainted, and the contract is void because it is founded upon the negotiation, and through however many hands the offer of an insurance may pass, if there be a concealment by the assured or his agents the policy is avoided.

If this view which we have taken of the facts and of the law which arises out of them be the true view, this judgment in no way conflicts with the decision in Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors in the House of Lords. Although the opinion was expressed in that case that it was not the duty of the agents to communicate to their principals the information which they had received, we take that opinion as applying to the particular facts before the House, which showed that before the negotiation for the policy sued upon had commenced, all connection of the plaintiffs with their former brokers had ceased; and we cannot suppose it would be intended to apply to the facts proved in the present case, which showed that, so far from the connection between the principals and their brokers ceasing, the brokers used the name of the principals to continue the negotiations, and the principals adopted this act, and themselves continued and carried out what their brokers had commenced. It is not for us to enter upon the question whether Messrs. Rose, Murison, & Thomson acted contrary to the rules of morality in failing to communicate to Messrs. Blackburn, Low, & Co. the information which they had received. Whatever may have been their moral duty, the fact that the information was given in confidence could not affect or lessen the legal rights of the defendants, and could not justify Messrs. Rose, Murison, & Thomson in continuing the negotiation in the plaintiffs' name, and enabling the plaintiffs themselves to continue it in innocence of that information. To hold otherwise would be to afford a great temptation to all brokers who may be placed in the same or a similar position, and would cut down to an important extent the rule as to good faith which has hitherto been applied by our courts and by commercial usage to the contract of insurance. We think that the summing up and verdict were correct. Therefore the verdict and judgment for the defendant must stand, and the motion must be dismissed, with costs.

FULHAM UNION ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE v. WELLS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Metropolis—Valuation Acts—Provisional list—Special sessions—Appeal—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), s. 47.

No appeal lies to special sessions from the determination of an assessment committee on an objection to a provisional list made under section 47 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869.

Case stated by special sessions.

A provisional list was made under section 47, sub-section (1), of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, fixing the gross and rateable value of an advertising hoarding. The assessment committee heard and determined an objection to the provisional list with reference to this hoarding, and the respondents appealed therefrom to the special sessions. Objection was taken to such an appeal, but the special sessions heard the appeal, subject to this case stated upon this objection.

Poland (A. Glen with him), for the appellants.—An appeal does not lie to special sessions against a provisional list, but only against the original list under sections 18 and 19, extended by section 46, sub-section 3. Section 47 provides the mode of objection to the provisional list, which is not by way of appeal. The ratepayer should wait for the next revision of the valuation list and apply for repayment or allowance of the excess under sub-section 10 of section 47.

Winch, Q.C., for the respondents.—Section 47, sub-section 10, makes the provisional list part of the valuation list for all purposes, and therefore the provisions of section 19 giving an appeal apply.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that Mr. Poland's contention must succeed, on the ground that no appeal lies from the assessment committee to the special sessions. It is undoubted law that an appeal is the creature of statute, and must be expressly given, and cannot be given by inference. The Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), provides for making a valuation list, and section 18, and the following sections, contain provisions as to appeals to special sessions with relation to the list first made. Section 46 provides, however, for the revision of the valuation list, which is to be made yearly and quinquennially: yearly by a supplemental list, and quinquennially by a new list. Section 46, sub-section 3, applies to the cases of a supplemental list and of a new list the regulations and proceedings directed by the Act in the case of the valuation list first made. This is strong to show that sections 18, 19, and 20, in the first instance, would apply only to the valuation list made in the first year after the passing of the Act; but section 46, sub-section 3, applies these provisions to the supplemental and new valuation lists, and this clause clearly gives an appeal to special sessions against a supplemental list and a new list by reference to the provisions of section 19. The proviso to section 47 contains provisions by which every new valuation matter of taxation is to be drawn in at shorter intervals than a year, so that the owners of buildings built between the times of making the valuation lists may be made to pay an apportioned part of the rates imposed in that interval.

The provisions of this section do not operate, as do those of section 46, sub-section 3, by reference, re-enacting other sections and applying them to new subject-matter, but section 47 is express in its terms, and gives power to go before the assessment committee and object to the provisional list, but it stops there, and contains nothing to enable the occupier to go beyond the assessment committee. It is contended for the respondents that sub-section 10 of section 47, by which the provisional list "shall be deemed to form part of the valuation list," means that for all purposes it shall be so deemed, but I cannot put such a wide interpretation upon the words of that sub-section. On comparing the words of section 46, sub-section 5, we find that it provides that the valuation list which is in force one year, together with, and as altered by, the supplemental list, "shall be the valuation list" for the next year, but in section 47, sub-section 10, the language is changed, and the expression used is "shall be deemed to form part of the valuation list." Wherever the Legislature uses the expression "shall be deemed" that is an indication that it is not intended that the subject-matter to which the expression is applied shall be for all purposes that which by the Act it is to be deemed to be, but only that it shall be so for such purposes as the Legislature has in view at the time. That is, in the present case, with reference to the poor rate in force and to be levied, as if the provisional list formed part of the valuation list.

If there could be any doubt as to this being the true construction, it would be made clear by the concluding part of section 47, sub-section 10. If it be asked whether, where the valuation is manifestly too high, there is not an appeal, the answer is that there is not unless the statute give one, and the concluding part of section 47, sub-section 10, shows that this is so, by providing that if, on the next revision of the valuation list, the revised list shows a value less than that in the provisional list, the amount of rate or tax overpaid shall be repaid or allowed.

This would be unnecessary if an appeal were given against the provisional list, and there is no such provision with regard to the supplemental list.

On both the grounds which I have stated I have come to the conclusion that the Legislature intended that from the provisional list there should be no appeal, but that the right to recover any excess should depend on the final valuation when the list is revised, and, therefore, that no appeal lay from the assessment committee to the special sessions.

A. L. Smith, J., concurred.

Marquis of Abergavenny v. Bishop of Llandaff. (a.)

Ecclesiastical law — Advowson — Refusal of bishop to institute clerk — Discretion — Welsh diocese — Ignorance of Welsh language — 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, s. 104.

The bishop has a right to refuse to institute a presentee who is not a fit clerk to a vacant benefice.

Where a clerk was presented to a vacant benefice within a Welsh diocese, though situate in England, who was ignorant of, and refused to be examined in, the Welsh language,

Held, that the presentee was not a fit clerk by reason of his ignorance of the Welsh language; that the bishop was the sole judge as to the linguistic requirements of the parish, and was not bound to hold any public or formal inquiry.

This was an action in the nature of a quare impedit tried by Huddleston, B. In October, 1886, the Marquis of Abergavenny presented the Rev. R. W. Gosse to the benefice of Goytre, in Monmouthshire, but which, although situate in England, is within the diocese of Llandaff.

The bishop of the diocese had refused to institute Mr. Gosse, on the ground of his inability to speak the Welsh language.

Section 104 of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, provides that "Within the several dioceses of St. Asaph, Bangor, Llandaff, and St. David's it shall, and may, be lawful for the bishop, if he shall think fit, to refuse institution or licence to any spiritual person who, after due examination and inquiry, shall be found unable to preach, administer the Sacraments, perform other pastoral duties, and converse in the Welsh language: Provided always that any such spiritual person may, within one month after such refusal, appeal to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who shall either confirm such refusal or direct the bishop to grant institution or licence, as shall seem to the said archbishop just and proper. . . ."

Upon the bishop's refusal the patron brought the present action against him.

The facts, pleadings, gist of the argument, and of the authorities cited, are so fully dealt with in the judgment that it is unnecessary to set them out.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 22nd of February Huddleston, B., delivered the following written judgment:—

This was an action in the nature of a quare impedit. The statement of claim set out the plaintiff's title to the advowson of the church rectory and benefice of Goytre, in the county of Monmouth, in the diocese of Llandaff; that on the 16th of April, 1886, that benefice became vacant; that the plaintiff was entitled to present to the Lord Bishop of Llandaff a fit clerk for admission; and that he accordingly, on the 4th of October, 1886, presented the defendant the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, a fit clerk, and requested the defendant to admit and institute him; and that the defendant, on the 12th of November, 1886, unjustly refused and still refuses to admit or institute the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse to the said church rectory and benefice. And the plaintiff claims a declaration that he is entitled to have the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse admitted, and a writ directing such admission, damages, costs of the action, and further relief. In the statement of defence the defendant says that he has not and does not claim to have anything in the said church rectory and benefice except the admission, institution, and induction of persons to the said church rectory and benefice; that the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse was not a fit clerk, wherefore the defendant thought fit to refuse institution; that the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse was so unfit by reason of the church rectory and benefice of Goytre being within the diocese of Llandaff; and that the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse was and is unable to preach, administer the Sacraments, and perform other pastoral duties, and converse in the Welsh language; and that the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse was, after examination and inquiry, found unable to preach, administer the Sacraments, and perform other pastoral duties, and converse in the Welsh language, whereupon the defendant thought fit to refuse institution to him. It alleged also that the defendant refused to admit or institute the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse unless and until he should have presented himself for examination in the Welsh language with a view to the defendant's ascertaining whether he should, on such examination, be found able to preach, &c., in the Welsh language, which the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse then neglected and declined to do, which is the alleged refusal in the statement of claim mentioned, and, save as aforesaid, the defendant did not refuse as in the statement of claim mentioned; that the defendant always has been and still is ready and willing to examine the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, or to cause him to be duly examined, with the view aforesaid. And the defendant further says that since the action he offered to examine the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, or cause him to be examined, which offer the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse refused to accept. The plaintiff, in his reply, admits that the rectory and benefice in question of Goytre are in the diocese of Llandaff, but that the same are in England; that after the presentation of the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse to the benefice, the defendant, without notice to the plaintiff or to the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, issued a commission to certain persons to inquire into the necessity or otherwise of appointing as incumbent of the parish of Goytre a clergyman who should be conversant with the Welsh language; that on the 2nd of November, 1886, the commissioners met for the purposes of such inquiry; that the plaintiff and the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse were prepared to show that few if any people in Goytre were imperfectly or not at all instructed in the Welsh language, and that there was no ground for requiring a knowledge of Welsh in the incumbent for Goytre; and the solicitor for the plaintiff and the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse applied to the commissioners to be allowed to be present at the inquiry and to be heard on their behalf, but the commissioners refused to hear the solicitor, or allow him or any person other than the witness under examination and a newspaper reporter to be present at the inquiry. The commissioners further refused to receive the evidence of any witness not then habitually resident in Goytre, and thus excluded several important witnesses whom the plaintiff and the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse desired should be examined. That the commissioners on the 11th of November sent to the defendant a summary of the evidence taken by them and reported; that the defendant without any further or other inquiry, and without notice to the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, or the plaintiff, on the 12th of November refused to institute the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse to the benefice of Goytre unless and until he passed an examination in the Welsh language. The plaintiff admits that the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse refused to be examined in the Welsh language, submits he had a right so to do, and further admits that the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse is ignorant of the Welsh language. The plaintiff also submits that the defendant was, before refusing to institute the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, bound himself duly to inquire whether the circumstances were such as to justify a refusal to institute him on the ground of ignorance of the Welsh language; that the defendant was not entitled to delegate such duty to any other persons; that the inquiry of the commissioners was wholly void; that the refusal of the said Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse was without legal cause; and that, save as aforesaid, the plaintiff denies the allegations in the defence and each and every of them. The defendant rejoins, alleging that though the church rectory and benefice of Goytre are in England they were in the diocese of Llandaff; he admits that, without notice to the plaintiff or to the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, he issued what was referred to as a commission, and that on the 2nd of November the persons acting thereunder met for the purpose of the inquiry; that the solicitor for the plaintiff and the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse applied to the said persons to be allowed to be present at the inquiry; that those persons refused to hear the solicitor, or allow him or any other person other than the witness under examination and a newspaper reporter to be present; that the so-called commission was entirely informal, and was instituted wholly for the purpose of informing the mind of the defendant, and was not properly to be styled a commission, and the defendant never in fact issued any commission. The defendant does not admit that the plaintiff or the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, or either of them, were prepared to show the matters which it is alleged in the third paragraph of the reply that they were prepared to show, or any of such matters. That the defendant, though not bound in law so to do, before refusing to institute the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, duly inquired whether and was satified that the circumstances were such as to necessitate a refusal to institute him on the ground of ignorance of the Welsh language, and, in fact, many of the inhabitants of Goytre spoke Welsh and understood that language better than English, and divers of them were imperfectly or not at all instructed in the English language. He also alleges that after the report of the commissioners, and after the commencement of the action, on the 19th of March, the defendant himself personally held a public inquiry in the parish into the linguistic condition of the parish with a view to satisfy himself, by personal inquiry in the parish, whether it was such as to require that its incumbent should possess a knowledge of the Welsh language. The defendant, after carefully holding the said inquiry and hearing the evidence, was of opinion that the condition of the parish was such as to require that its incumbent should possess a knowledge of the Welsh language, to enable him to preach, administer the Sacraments, perform other pastoral duties, and converse in the Welsh language; that the said last-mentioned inquiry was entirely free from the supposed objections urged against the original inquiry, and the defendant, after holding the same, offered to examine the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, or cause him to be examined, in the Welsh language, which offer the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse refused to accept, whereupon the defendant again refused to institute him.

The defendant alleges that, by the true construction of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, s. 104, the words "after due examination and inquiry" therein contained refer to an examination or inquiry into the linguistic powers of the spiritual person in question, and not into the linguistic condition or requirements of the parish, and consequently the defendant was entitled, if he should think fit, to refuse institution to any benefice within the diocese of Llandaff to any spiritual person found unable to preach, administer the Sacraments, perform other pastoral duties, and converse in the Welsh language, without holding any formal or other inquiry into the linguistic condition of the parish, or as to whether the circumstances were such as to justify a refusal to institute on the ground of ignorance of the Welsh language, and that in any case the defendant was the sole judge, in his uncontrolled discretion, as to the linguistic requirements of the parish, and was not bound to hold either a public or formal inquiry.

To this the plaintiff surrejoins that the inquiry by the bishop himself on the 19th of March was invalid, as it was held after the refusal of the defendant to institute the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse; that neither the said Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse nor the plaintiff was required to attend; and that the time within which the defendant was required by law to accept or refuse the said Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse had elapsed long before the inquiry. The points on the pleadings would seem, therefore, to raise the issues as to whether the inquiry before what we called the commissioners and the subsequent inquiry by the bishop himself were invalid—while it was admitted that the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse was not a person conversant with the Welsh language and refused to be examined in that language—the defendant relying upon the construction which he put upon the statute referred to. The facts proved before me were these. On the 16th of April, 1886, the previous rector of Goytre died, Goytre being in Monmouthshire, but within the diocese of Llandaff. On the 16th of August the bishop, in answer to a letter of the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, no doubt informing him of the intention of the plaintiff to appoint him to the living, wrote to Mr. Gosse, saying, "I think it right to inform you that representations have been made to me that a knowledge of Welsh is required by the incumbent of Goytre. I am not at present prepared to say that such a knowledge is requisite, but the matter has been so strongly urged that I think it will be necessary for me to issue a commission to inquire into the lingual condition of the parish before I can undertake to institute a clergyman ignorant of Welsh. In saying this I am assuming that you are unacquainted with the Welsh language. In reply to your inquiry with regard to a house, I desire to say that if there is no suitable house in the parish I shall be prepared to give you a licence of non-residence for the present, provided you are able to procure a house sufficiently near to the church and parish to enable you to discharge your parochial duties efficiently." On the 4th of October the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse was presented by the plaintiff to the benefice of Goytre, and on the 9th of October he wrote to the bishop, saying that he had inquired in different parts of the parish as to whether there were Welsh-speaking people resident there, and that he had been informed that "all were able to speak English well, and that there were only two or three families on the borders of the parish, near Llanover, who were acquainted with Welsh." On the 10th of October the bishop replied that, "In consequence of representations made to me it will be my duty to make formal inquiry into the lingual condition of the parish of Goytre, but should it turn out that the state of things is as represented in your letter, I shall have much pleasure in instituting you to the benefice." On the 15th of October the bishop wrote to Mr. Lewis, who had been high sheriff for the county, saying that he had resolved to appoint a commission as to whether the parish required a pastor who should possess a knowledge of Welsh, and asking Mr. Lewis to act as a commissioner for that purpose in conjunction with the Archdeacon of Monmouth and Canon Evans, the vicar of Rhymney; and it would seem that those two clergymen were also requested by the bishop to undertake that inquiry. No notice of the appointment was given either to the marquis or to Mr. Gosse; but the rumour of the intended appointment seems to have reached Messrs. Gabb & Walford, the plaintiff's solicitors, and on the 23rd of October they wrote, asking when and where the commission would sit, as both the patron and Mr. Gosse should, of course, be represented. The bishop's secretary, on the 25th of October, referred Messrs. Gabb & Walford to the Archdeacon of Monmouth, as chairman of the commission, and on the 29th of October, Messrs. Gabb & Walford applied to the archdeacon, as solicitors for the patron, the Marquis of Abergavenny, and as representing the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, proposing, with his concurrence, being present at the inquiry to conduct the case in support of the view of the patron that there was no necessity to appoint as rector a clergyman conversant with the Welsh language, adding "We have before us a copy of the notice affixed to the church door, and observe that you propose to confine the evidence to that which can be given by persons 'habitually' resident in the parish. May we ask you whether the evidence of any persons who have formerly been resident but who have lately removed would be accepted? We make this inquiry in order to avoid the unpleasantness and inconvenience of possibly getting someone to attend whose evidence, after all, might not be accepted." In answer to that, on the 30th of October, the archdeacon replies that "It will be undesirable to depart from the strict interpretation of the condition affecting the evidence to be offered and laid down in the notice of commission—that the decision of the court of commissioners will probably, if not certainly, be against admitting or hearing counsel on either side." On the 2nd of November the archdeacon, Canon Evans, and Mr. Lewis sat. No summons or notice was given to either the plaintiff or the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse. The rumour of the meeting, however, reached Messrs. Gabb & Walford. Mr. Walford attended on behalf of the plaintiff and the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse, and applied to be present and to be heard, but was refused by the archdeacon, who informed him that no person would be allowed to be present except those who were about to give evidence, and one newspaper reporter. Mr. Walford had brought with him several witnesses who were conversant with the parish of Goytre, some residents of the parish, and others, though not resident, persons who had served offices in the parish and were well conversant with its requirements. He applied for permission to call those witnesses, but was refused. The Commissioners made their report, and on the 12th of November the bishop, after having received the report, sent this extract from it to the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse:—"We are of opinion that a knowledge of Welsh will be not only important but necessary if the incumbent is to keep touch with his parishioners as a whole, and we cannot consistently with duty recommend your lordship to appoint as incumbent a clergyman whose ignorance of Welsh would be an absolute bar to his influence with fifty or sixty of his parishioners, and might easily interfere with his highest influence with a much larger number." The bishop added, "Under these circumstances I regret to say that it will be impossible for me to institute you to the above benefice until you have passed an examination in Welsh by my Welsh examining chaplain." On November 13 the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse wrote to the bishop:—"In reply to your lordship's letter, received this morning, I beg to say that, as the appointment to Goytre was entirely unsought by me, the matter rests between your lordship and the Marquis of Abergavenny, and I know he is not satisfied with the way in which the commission was conducted. I have forwarded your lordship's letter to the marquis and a copy of it to his solicitors. I regret for many reasons the decision of the commissioners." On November 19 the bishop wrote to the Marquis of Abergavenny explaining that in consequence of representations made to him he had appointed the commission; that he regretted that the commissioners were unanimously of opinion that a knowledge of Welsh was absolutely necessary in order to enable the incumbent of the parish to minister duly to a considerable section of the parishioners; and that "under these circumstances I have been reluctantly compelled to decline to institute the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse. As it is very desirable that the parish should be provided with an incumbent as soon as possible, I trust your lordship will kindly present as soon as may be convenient another clergyman who is conversant with the Welsh language." On the 23rd the marquis replies, alleging that the bishop's refusal to institute Mr. Gosse had been a great surprise to him. "However, and if need be, the presentation of another clergyman in the place of Mr. Gosse will receive my earliest attention," and asking for a copy of the commissioners' report. On December 13 the bishop sends to the Marquis of Abergavenny a copy of the report, "Being anxious that you, as patron, should be made acquainted with the grounds upon which I have arrived at the decision communicated in my last letter."

In February the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse appealed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and, the appeal being heard on the 17th, the archbishop, assisted by the Vicar-General, Sir James Parker Deane, declared that he was not in a position to decide upon the appeal, inasmuch as the above-named commissioners refused to admit either the appellant or the patron of the benefice to their inquiry. It should be noticed that the appeal to the archbishop was solely on the ground that the bishop had refused to institute the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse as he was unable to preach, administer the Sacraments, and perform other pastoral duties, and converse in the Welsh language. On March 9 the bishop wrote to the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse:—"Referring to the correspondence that has passed between us relative to your institution to the living of Goytre, I desire to remind you that you have not yet informed me whether or not it is your intention to undergo an examination in Welsh by my Welsh examining chaplain. I shall therefore esteem it a favour if you will let me know at your earliest convenience what your intentions are, in order that I may fix a day and hour which may be convenient for holding such examination. I hope I need not add that if you are able to satisfy me that you are possessed of a sufficient knowledge of Welsh to enable you to discharge adequately your ministerial duties in the above parish it will be a pleasure to me to institute you to the benefice." To that letter Mr. Gosse sent no reply. On March 19 the bishop himself held a personal inquiry at Goytre, as stated in the pleadings. It is obvious, therefore, upon the pleadings and upon the facts, that the question which I have to decide is whether, it being taken as an admitted fact that the Rev. Robert Wilkes Gosse could not speak the Welsh language, and was not in a position to submit to an examination in that language, the proceedings were such as to justify the bishop in refusing to institute him. The point set up in the rejoinder that the time within which the defendant was required by law to accept him had elapsed was not put forward or relied upon. In the time of Queen Elizabeth it was decided, in the case of Albany v. Bishop of St. Asaph, Croke Eliz. 119, that it was a good ground of refusal by a bishop to institute a clergyman if he could not speak Welsh in a parish where the parishioners did not understand English, for he cannot instruct his flock according to his duty and charge. It was also decided in that case that, the patron having six months to present, the notice should be given within that time. The point on the notice is more fully reported in Leonard's Reports, p. 31. I mention this, as Sir Henry James, in his argument, relied upon the question of notice, but that point does not seem to me to be important in the decision at which I have arrived. The defendant there pleaded that the parishioners were homines Wallici, Wallicam loquentes linguam et non aliam, and that the presentee could not speak or understand the Welsh language.

It was argued "that the defect of the Welsh language assigned by the defendant in the presence of the plaintiff is not a sufficient cause of refusal; for notwithstanding that it be convenient that such a presentee have the knowledge of such language, yet, by the law of the land, ignorance of such language, where the party hath more excellent languages, is not any disability; and therefore we see that many bishops in Wales who have the principal cure of souls are Englishmen, and the Welsh language may easily be learned in a short time by converse with Welshmen; and the statute of 1 Elizabeth, which establisheth the Book of Common Prayer, ordaineth that the said Book of Common Prayer shall be put in use in all the parish churches in England and Wales without any provision there for the translation of the said book into the Welsh language. But afterwards by a private Act it was done, by which it is enacted that the Bishop of Wales should procure the Epistles and Gospels to be translated and read in the Welsh language, which matter our presentee might do by a curate well enough. . . . Gawdy, Serjeant, contrary, confessed that at common law the defects aforesaid were not any cause of refusal; but now by reason of a private Act, made 1 Elizabeth, intituled an Act made for the translating of the Bible and of the Divine Service into the Welsh tongue, the same defect is become a good cause of refusal; in which Act the mischief is recited—viz., That the inhabitants of Wales did not understand the language of England, therefore it was enacted that the bishops of Wales should procure so many of the Bibles and Books of Common Prayer to be printed in the Welsh language as there are parishes and cathedral churches in Wales, and so upon this statute this imperfection is become a good cause of refusal. Lord Anderson held that upon the said statute the want of the Welsh language in the presentee is now become a good cause of refusal." He then referred to the matter of the pleading of the private Act, but it was ultimately decided by the whole court that the ground of refusal was a good one.

That case went off upon the question of notice; but it may be, if it had been submitted to a jury, as it should have been (Coke's II. Inst., 631), that two questions might have arisen for their decision, the one as to the linguistic state of the parish requiring a Welsh-speaking parson, and the other as to the knowledge of the presentee of that language, and it may be that the findings upon both those points would be necessary to support the refusal of the bishop, unless the statute I am about to refer to make a difference. It has been held ever since that case that the refusal to induct a person not knowing Welsh to a parish where the Welsh language was necessary has been a good ground of refusal. By 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 77, commissioners were appointed who, by section 10, were to lay schemes before the council for carrying out certain recommendations, and by section 11 the commissioners were to prepare and lay before his Majesty such scheme as should appear to the said commissioners best adapted for preventing the appointment of any clergyman not fully conversant with the Welsh language to any benefice with cure of souls in Wales in any parish the majority of the inhabitants of which do not understand the English language. This clearly shows the intention of the Legislature in accordance with the decision of Albany v. Bishop of St. Asaph. The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106 is the statute upon which the bishop relies. By the 103rd section of that Act it is recited that "Whereas in many benefices in Wales and in the counties adjacent thereto many of the inhabitants are imperfectly or not at all instructed in the English language, and it is expedient that persons to be hereafter instituted or licensed to such benefices should possess an adequate knowledge of the Welsh language." It then recites the statute of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, repeals a portion of that statute, and enacts, by the 104th section, "That within the several dioceses of St. Asaph, Bangor, Llandaff, and St. David's it shall and may be lawful for the bishop, if he shall think fit, to refuse institution or licence to any spiritual person who, after due examination and inquiry, shall be found unable to preach, administer the Sacraments, perform other pastoral duties, or converse in the Welsh language," with a power of appeal to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and "Providing, also, that nothing thereinbefore contained shall be construed to affect or abridge any rights which the inhabitants of any benefice within the said four Welsh dioceses may at present by law possess of entering a caveat against or objecting in due course of law to the institution, collation, or licence of any spiritual person, or of proceeding to procure the deprivation of any such person."

I have to consider upon this statute what is the meaning of the words "if he shall think fit"; whether as contended by the plaintiff, they mean that the bishop must institute something in the nature of a judicial inquiry, or whether, as the defendant contends, they mean it to be a matter entirely in his own discretion. If the former, it is said that natural justice requires that he should be heard, or should have an opportunity of presenting his view to the persons deciding such natural justice as is described in an old law report as having its origin when Adam was not turned out of the Garden of Eden until he had been called upon to show cause and been heard, and the cases of Capel v. Child, 2 Crompton & Jervis, 558; Ex parte Ramshay, 21 L. J. N. S. Q. B. 228, were quoted, to which may be added the cases of Reg. v. Smith, 5 Q. B. 614; and Rex v. Gaskin, 8 T. R. 209. In the first of these cases the question involved a judicial inquiry into the discharge of the ecclesiastical duties of the plaintiff as vicar of the parish, and in the judgments the decision went on the ground that this was a judicial proceeding. So in the case of Ex parte Ramshay, where the Chancellor of the Duchy had removed a county court judge on the ground of misconduct, where, again, there was an inquiry in the nature of a judicial proceeding; and so in the case of Reg. v. Smith. If the plaintiff is right, these cases would support his contention; and the objection to the first commission—that neither the plaintiff nor the presentee were summoned or allowed to be heard—would be a good objection. And the same argument would apply with reference to the inquiry held by the bishop himself on the same grounds, although a more fatal objection to that would be, in this suit, that it was after action brought. But I read the section as giving an absolute discretion to the bishop, which he may exercise without any formal inquiry of a judicial character. Four dioceses are mentioned in the section in which this discretion is to be exercised and to which it is to be confined.

I think the Legislature considered that the bishop would or ought to know the wants or requirements of the different parishes within his diocese, or that he could readily obtain such information as would justify him in exercising his discretion: Reg. v. Governors of Darlington Free Grammar School, 6 Q. B. 682; Doe d. Childe and others, Trustees of the Ludlow Charities v. Willis, 5 Ex. 894; Hayman v. Governors of Rugby School, 22 W. R. 587, L. R. 18 Eq. 28. In the case of Julius v. Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214, the question was raised under the 3rd section of the Church Discipline Act, which provided "That in any case of every clerk in holy orders who may be charged with any offence against the law ecclesiastical, or concerning whom there may exist scandal or evil report as having offended against the said laws, it shall be lawful for the bishop of the diocese within which the offence is alleged or reported to have been committed, on the application of any party complaining thereof, or, if he shall think fit, of his own mere motion, to issue a commission under his hand and seal to certain persons for the purpose of making inquiry as to the grounds of such charge or report"; and it was held there that that section gave the bishop complete discretion to issue, or decline to issue, such commission; and Lord Cairns, at the end of his judgment, referring to these words, says:—"I ought to mention an argument which was much dwelt upon before your lordships and in the courts below—viz., the argument that the words 'if he shall think fit,' in the 3rd section, in the alternative power to the bishop to proceed of his own mere motion, rather imply that, on the application of a third party, he is to proceed, whether he thinks fit or not. I do not think that the words 'if he shall think fit' have any such effect. They appear to me to be, where they occur, mere surplusage, as, indeed, is proved by the circumstance that if they were altogether omitted that clause of the section would mean just exactly what it means with those words inserted. But the words, in fact, appear to me to be introduced merely to mark more clearly that an alternative power is conferred upon the bishop, and that he is left free to proceed without any one to put him in motion, if he chooses to do so." And I think that this was the intention of the Legislature in the present case. The 104th section goes on to show that there must be due examination and inquiry upon the question of the knowledge by the presentee of the Welsh language; and, looking at the allocation of the words, it seems to me that the question of the necessity of the parish for a Welsh-speaking parson is a matter entirely in the discretion of the bishop, but that the linguistic (to use the phrase in the pleadings) knowledge of the parson must be the subject of due examination and inquiry; and that the only appeal given to the archbishop is as to the knowledge by the parson of Welsh, and that no appeal is given with reference to the requirements of the parish. It is remarkable to see that the former ground is the only one taken in the proceedings of appeal before the archbishop. The appointment by the bishop of the commissioners, so-called, may be (as it was) an inquiry to enable him to exercise his own discretion, and not by any means in the nature of a delegation of the authority vested in him, or a judicial inquiry. He might have got his information from any source which he thought reliable, and the fact of having selected three gentlemen whose position could leave no doubt as to the value and integrity of the information they could afford him was, perhaps, more satisfactory to his mind than any other inquiry he might choose to make. With reference to the question as to whether he made due examination and inquiry as to the knowledge of Welsh, it would seem that the allegation to that effect which was in the statement of defence was not substantially denied in the rejoinder; but it is clear beyond all doubt, upon the evidence and upon inquiry, and Mr. Gosse himself admits and confesses on the pleadings, that he is ignorant of the Welsh language and could not submit to the examination which the bishop required him to do in his letter of the 12th of November, and has refused to be so examined. I have stated the pleadings and facts at some length because I think it right that every circumstance connected with the course which the bishop has felt it to be his duty to take should be apparent on the face of my judgment. The bishop had a right to refuse to institute a presentee who was not a fit clerk. The Rev. R. W. Gosse was not a fit clerk, in consequence of his want of knowledge of Welsh, for the parish of Goytre, which the bishop, in his discretion, found to be a parish requiring a Welsh-speaking parson. He has, therefore, established the defence set up in the pleadings. I find my verdict for the defendant, and give judgment accordingly, with costs.

Bankruptcy—Costs—Review of taxation—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 112 (2).

Rule 112 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, applies to costs which, by the provisions of the Act, are payable out of the estate, and the rule does not apply to costs which are in the discretion of the court, and which, in consequence of the court exercising its discretion in one particular manner, may come to be paid out of the estate.

Motion to review taxation of costs.

On the 8th of December, 1887, an appeal was brought by the applicant to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy from an order of the county court at Northallerton directing him to repay to the official receiver, as trustee, the sum of £21 and costs alleged to have been received as a fraudulent preference.

The Divisional Court allowed the appeal, and ordered that the appellant be repaid the £21, with costs here and below; and further ordered that the official receiver, as trustee, be at liberty to take the costs out of the estate.

It was now contended by the official receiver that the costs should be taxed on the lower scale under rule 112 (2) of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, the bankruptcy in question being a small bankruptcy.

Ringwood, for the applicant.—Rule 112 (2) says that where the estimated assets of the debtor do not exceed the sum of three hundred pounds, "a lower scale of solicitor's costs shall be allowed in all proceedings under the Act in which costs are payable out of the estate—namely, three-fifths of the charges ordinarily allowed, disbursements being added; and if in error any charges have been allowed or paid on the higher scale, and the gross proceeds of the assets shall be ascertained not to exceed three hundred pounds, the excess shall be disallowed, and, if paid, shall be repaid to the trustee." But the scale applies to the costs of the solicitor to the trustee and the solicitor to the debtor, and it cannot apply to costs to be paid by the trustee to third parties. It was not intended to apply to cases where the trustee, as an ordinary litigant, takes proceedings against some outside person.

He referred to Ex parte Angerstein, In re Angerstein, 22 W. R. 581, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 479.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.

CAVE, J.—I think the master has not put the right construction on rule 112, and that rule 112 was intended to apply to costs which, by the provisions of the Act, are payable out of the estate. There are plenty of cases of that kind of which numerous examples are to be found in the scale of costs itself, and whenever that is so undoubtedly there the costs which, by the Act, are to be paid out of the estate, are to be paid on the lower scale. But I do not think the rule was ever intended to apply to costs which are in the discretion of the court, and which, in consequence of the court exercising its discretion in one particular way, may come to be paid out of the estate. It would involve, as it seems to me, a monstrous piece of injustice that the trustee might initiate legal proceedings against the third party in all these cases under section 121, because it must not only apply to cases where the official receiver is trustee, but where the trustee is appointed by the creditors in place of the official receiver, and may, therefore, commence proceedings if this contention is right, with a comfortable feeling that if he wins he would get full costs, whilst, if he lost, he would only have to pay three-fifths. I cannot conceive that to be the meaning of the Act. There is another, which is a more simple and natural meaning to be attributed to it, and that is the meaning which I think it must bear. The case must go back to the master to review his taxation with my direction that, under the circumstances of this case, he is to allow the appellant his full costs.

Bankruptcy—Proof—Application to reduce or expunge—Application in name of creditor for benefit of bankrupt—Abuse of process—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), schedule 2, r. 25.

At the hearing of an application by one creditor in the bankruptcy to reduce or expunge the proof of another creditor, the preliminary objection was taken that such application, although made in the name of the creditor, was in reality for the benefit and on behalf of the bankrupt.

Held, that the application must be dismissed.

Application under rule 25 of schedule 2 to the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, by one creditor in the bankruptcy to reduce or expunge the proof of another creditor.

The preliminary objection was taken, however, that the application, although made in the name of the creditor, was really for the benefit and on behalf of the bankrupt, who could not make it.

F. C. Willis, in support.—The sole object of the creditor making this application is because the bankrupt could not do so. It is for his benefit, in order that he may make a fresh application for his discharge. The court will not allow a creditor to be put up for a debtor in this way.

Mirams, for the applicant.—Whatever the cause of the motion by the applicant may be he is entitled to make it. Even if his desire was to benefit the bankrupt it does not affect the question.

CAVE, J.—I think that the preliminary objection must prevail. Undoubtedly it is not permissible to attempt to use the process of the court to do indirectly that which the process of the court will not allow to be done directly. So long as a creditor is coming forward bonâ fide to challenge the decision of a trustee he may do so, but in a case of this kind, where there is no expectation that the dividend would be increased by excluding the creditor, some other reason must be looked for. Now the solicitor for the applicant admits that the object is to benefit the bankrupt—to get the debts reduced in order that he may make a fresh application for discharge. The bankrupt could not make this application, and the creditor does it for him. A creditor may do so bonâ fide for his own purposes, but he may not do so for such a purpose as is attempted here.

Application dismissed.

Seaton v. Seaton. (a.)

Infant—Ward of court—Married woman—Post-nuptial settlement—Reversionary interest in personal estate—Infants' Settlement Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 43).

An infant ward of court, having married without the sanction of the court, afterwards executed a post-nuptial settlement with the approval of the Vice-Chancellor, whereby she settled a reversionary interest in personalty, to which she was entitled under a will made in 1838, and to which therefore the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 57 did not apply, upon trusts for herself for life, with remainder to her children. A dissolution of the marriage was decreed on the wife's petition, but during coverture she had recognised the settlement in various ways. The reversionary interest fell into possession after the dissolution of the marriage.

Held, that neither the sanction of the court nor the Infants' Settlement Act, 1855, could make the post-nuptial settlement of the wife's reversionary interest in personalty binding upon her; that no acts of acquiescence during coverture—and, after the dissolution of the marriage, nothing except the actual disposition by her of the property to the trustees of the settlement—could have that effect, and therefore that she was entitled to a transfer of the property to herself.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 438, 35 Ch. D. 21) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Lindley, and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported as Buckmaster v. Buckmaster, 35 W. R. 438, 35 Ch. D. 21, reversing a decision of Bacon, V.C., reported 35 W. R. 25, 33 Ch. D. 482.

The facts and arguments in the case are fully set out in the judgment delivered by Lord Herschell.

Feb. 27, 28.—A. G. Marten, Q.C., and Wilkinson, for the appellants.—The settlement was made with the approval of the court, and cannot be set aside: Earl of Buckinghamshire v. Drury, 3 Bro. The settlement is binding under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 43: Powell v. Oakley, 34 Beav. 575, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 33; In re Sampson and Wall, 32 W. R. 617, 25 Ch. D. 482; In re Phillips, 35 W. R. 284, 34 Ch. D. 467. The wife is estopped from disputing the settlement, as she has acknowledged it in various ways: Wigney v. Wigney, 30 W. R. 722, 7 P. Fischer, Q.C., and B. B. Rogers, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Feb. 28.—Lord Herschell.—This appeal arises upon a petition by Louisa Christian Seaton, praying for payment to her of a sum of about £20,000 Consols, being her share of the residuary estate of her father, William Buckmaster, under his will, made in the year 1838. Down to the month of February, 1886, she was entitled to this share of her father's residuary estate in reversion only, expectant upon the death of her mother.

On the 28th of April, 1862, the petitioner, being then eighteen years of age, married. She was a ward of court, and a suit for the administration of her father's estate was pending. She married without the sanction of the court, and, as it appears, without the knowledge of her mother. On the 15th of May, 1862, very shortly after the marriage, an order was made by the Court of Chancery for an inquiry whether a valid marriage had been had between the ward, Louisa Christian, and Charles Seaton, and, if so, of what the infant's fortune consisted, and what would be a proper settlement to be made of it. On the 27th of June in the following year the chief clerk made his certificate, finding that a valid marriage had been solemnized between Louisa Christian and Charles Seaton, and finding what property she was entitled to, and the terms of the settlement which it was considered would be proper. On the 9th of July, 1863, a marriage settlement was executed by Charles and Louisa Christian Seaton. It is not necessary that I should detain your lordships by a statement of the provisions of that deed of settlement; it was in a form which is very common in the case of settlements made upon marriage. It contained (and I think this is the only matter to which I need allude) a power of appointment over the settled property to be exercised jointly by the husband and wife during their lives, and on the decease of either of them by the survivor. It was a settlement of the entire interest which the wife possessed under the will of her father and under the will of her brother, who had died some years previously.

Upon the death of the tenant for life, in February, 1886, this petition was presented by Mrs. Seaton, praying for the payment to her of her share of the residuary estate. She was at that time divorced from her husband. I shall have occasion hereafter to allude to the divorce proceedings, but for the present it will be sufficient to state that she was in the same position as if she had been a widow as regarded her right to the fund of which she claimed payment.

The only question is whether Louisa Christian Seaton is deprived of the right which she would otherwise possess to the payment out to her of this fund now in court by reason of the settlement to which I have alluded, which was executed in July, 1863. Unless that settlement has effected a valid disposition of the property which came into possession in February, 1886, so as to exclude her present right to claim it, there can be no question as to the validity of her claim. It cannot be doubted, I think, that down to the time of the Act known as Sir Richard Malins' Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57), passed in the year 1857, a married woman could not make a valid disposition of a reversionary interest, and that since that Act she can only make a valid disposition of it with the formalities and in the manner provided by the Act.

I shall first of all consider the question raised with regard to the validity of the settlement, quite apart from the circumstances under which it was executed and the interposition of the Court of Chancery with regard to it, leaving those questions to be dealt with subsequently.

It has been argued, but somewhat faintly, that even prior to 1855 it was competent for an infant to execute a valid settlement which should dispose effectually of his or her property. For the purpose of establishing that proposition the case of Earl of Buckinghamshire v. Drury was relied upon. That case has given rise to a great deal of criticism since the time when the decision in it was pronounced, and much disapproval has been expressed of it. I do not think it necessary to say much with regard to it for this reason—that case decides this, and this alone, that it was competent for an infant, by means of a marriage settlement, to bar her right to obtain, by virtue of the marriage, an interest in her husband's property; and in the opinion expressed by

Lord Mansfield he distinctly says:—"I approve the distinction taken by Wilmot, J., between infants contracting for conveying away something of their own, and binding themselves of a right which is a third person's." It is quite unnecessary to inquire whether that distinction is one which can be supported by reasoning or not. It is sufficient to say that, whatever be the validity of the decision in that case, it cannot be relied upon as an authority beyond this, that in certain cases an infant may deprive herself of rights which she would otherwise have possessed in the property of her husband.

I entertain no doubt that it was well settled prior to 1855 that an infant could not, by a marriage settlement, dispose effectually of his or her property. Accordingly the Infants' Settlement Act of 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 43) was passed, which undoubtedly frees that date gave aid of the disability arising from infancy. It is unnecessary tediously the question what power there was prior to that Act in an infant to dispose of his property, because since that Act it is beyond all possibility of question that the disability of infancy is absolutely removed where the sanction of the court is obtained in the manner provided by the Act. Therefore, in the present case, so far as any disability arising from the infancy of Louisa Christian Seaton is concerned, that may be entirely disregarded, inasmuch as the settlement was a settlement made after the date of this statute.

But then it is contended on behalf of the appellants that the statute had an operation more extensive than that to which I have alluded; that it got rid, not only of the disability of infancy, but of the disability of coverture also; because it would not avail the appellants in the present case to get rid of the disability of infancy unless they could get rid of that disability of a married woman to dispose validly of her reversionary interest, which, beyond all possibility of doubt, existed in the year 1855, when this Act was passed.

The first question which arises upon the construction of this enactment is, whether it applies in terms or not to a post-nuptial settlement, the words of the statute being, "It shall be lawful for every infant upon or in contemplation of his or her marriage." In the case of Ex re Sampson and Wall the majority of the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that these words ought to be construed so as to include a post-nuptial as well as an ante-nuptial settlement, if the post-nuptial settlement was made on the occasion of the marriage so as to be connected with that event. I do not propose to express any opinion with regard to that decision in one way or another. It is unnecessary, in the view which I take, to do so. But certainly those who pronounced the decision do not appear to have contemplated as a logical consequence of it that which the learned counsel for the appellants have contended does logically follow—namely, that the statute not only applies to post-nuptial as well as to ante-nuptial settlements, but, because it applies to them, indicates an intention that an infant, though married, should have the full powers which the statute confers.

The reliance of the counsel for the appellants is placed upon the very ample language, as they assert, contained in the earlier part of this section. It appears to me to be impossible to construe an enactment of this description by taking it to pieces and looking at one part of the section alone and shutting your eyes to what is contained in another part closely and immediately connected with it. The first part of the section no doubt provides that "It shall be lawful for every infant upon or in contemplation of his or her marriage, with the sanction of the Court of Chancery, to make a valid and binding settlement or contract for a settlement of all or any part of his or her property, or property over which he or she has any power of appointment, whether real or personal, and whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy." But after declaring that it shall be lawful for every infant to make a valid and binding settlement under these circumstances, the section proceeds, "and every conveyance, appointment, and assignment of such real or personal estate, or contract to make a conveyance, appointment, or assignment thereof executed by such infant, with the approbation of the said court, for the purpose of giving effect to such settlement, shall be as valid and effectual as if the person executing the same were of the full age of twenty-one years."

If the first part of the section stood alone, I am by no means prepared to say that I should arrive at the conclusion that any disability was intended to be removed except that of infancy, or that it was intended to enable a settlement to be made which should be valid and binding in any other respect than as being the effect of the infancy of the person making the settlement; because one must look at the avowed purpose and object of the Act, at the inconvenience recited in the preamble and which the preamble states the statute is intended to remedy. Infancy is the only matter there pointed to, and one cannot shut one's eyes to the fact that at the time when this legislation was passed it was perfectly well known that there was in certain cases a disability, the disability of coverture, as familiar to the law as the disability of infancy; and if it had been intended to remove that disability as well as the disability of infancy I cannot conceive that the enactment would ever have been framed in the terms which we find in the statute with which we are dealing. I pointed out in the course of the argument that the contention on behalf of the appellants must really go further than its immediate purpose, which was to exclude the disability of coverture; for if the statute makes those dispositions valid and binding notwithstanding coverture, it seems to me that it must be equally read as making them valid and binding notwithstanding any disability of any kind which might otherwise affect their validity. I think it is impossible to put such a construction upon the section. I think, too, that the language to be found at the end of the section to which attention was called during the course of the argument, the proviso "that this enactment shall not extend to powers of which it is expressly declared that they shall not be executed by an infant," points strongly to the fact that it was the disability of infancy, and that alone, with which the Legislature was dealing when this Act was passed.

It is said that the words to be found in the earlier part of the section are general, and apply to interests of every description, including reversionary interests, such as a married woman is unable to deal with. The answer to that contention seems to me to be complete. A male infant might dispose of his reversionary interest; a female infant unmarried might dispose of her reversionary interest; and therefore there is no difficulty in giving effect to the whole of the language to be found in the earlier part of the section. All that is required is that you must read the language used in it as to the disposition of property in relation to other branches of the law regulating such disposition.

Therefore I have arrived, without any hesitation, at the conclusion that the enactment of 1855, though it got rid of the disability of infancy, did not get rid of any other disability or enable a married woman to do that which undoubtedly down to that time she could not—namely, dispose effectually of her reversionary interest during coverture.

That disposes of the main question in the case apart from the effect which is said to be given to the settlement by virtue of the authority of the Court of Chancery. There does not appear to have been any order, strictly speaking, that this settlement should be executed; but there can be no doubt that Charles Seaton, having without the consent of the court married a ward of court, was in contempt, and the court had power (a power which it constantly exercises) to prevent a person who in contempt had married a ward of court from obtaining a pecuniary benefit through the marital rights which he acquired, owing to the marriage, in the property of his wife. No doubt the power which the court possesses of committing him for contempt gives it an authority which is effectual for the purpose of enabling it to compel him to renounce, by means of a settlement, those marital rights, or, at all events, so far renounce them as the court thinks it proper to call upon him to do so. As regards the ward, I have heard no authority cited supporting the view that the court has any power to order her to execute a settlement; for if it possessed such power it would follow that it would have power to commit her for contempt in not executing the settlement which it had so ordered her to execute. No authority has been produced to your lordship's House supporting any such view, and there are certainly dicta of weight to the contrary.

It seems to me to be quite unnecessary to discuss the question, which has been a good deal discussed before us, of what power the court would have over one of its wards in that respect. The court no doubt sanctioned this particular settlement, approved its terms; but what more did the court do than to approve its terms? No doubt the settlement was perfectly valid and effectual and binding so as to prevent Charles Seaton from acquiring the absolute rights which would otherwise have been his owing to the marriage. But what is contended is this, that the settlement had, as regards Louisa Christian Seaton, given her a power of disposing of her property which she could not in point of law have possessed or made effectual but for the fact that the court sanctioned this form of conveyance. I am at a loss to understand what authority the Court of Chancery possesses to make a disposition effectual which in law is not and cannot be made effectual at the time at which the court so sanctions the disposition. And therefore I do not myself suppose—I refuse to suppose—that the Court of Chancery intended to do anything of the kind. This settlement was perfectly effectual, not only as regards Charles Seaton, but as regards Louisa Christian Seaton, to a very considerable extent even as regards what might have taken place with reference to the reversionary property; but I do not myself see any reason for believing that the Court of Chancery ever pronounced or intended to pronounce that it should be effectual to deprive Louisa Christian Seaton of the rights which, according to law, she would have possessed if the court had not given its sanction to the deed. It seems to me that by giving its sanction to the deed it did not cause the deed to be effective or effectual in any other way or to any greater extent than it would have been effectual if it had been executed without the sanction of the court. Of course I am not alluding here to infancy or the question of the disability of infancy.

I therefore think that the Court of Chancery did not by its interposition in this case render this deed more effectual to convey this reversionary interest than it would have been if the Court of Chancery had not intervened at all. No authority has been cited to show that the court would have had such a power if it had purported to exercise it. I do not think that the very general expressions of Lord Hardwicke in The Earl of Buckinghamshire v. Drury upon which Mr. Marten relied would establish that the court possessed such a power. Quite apart from that I can see no ground for the contention that the court has purported to exercise any such power or authority.

That, as it appears to me, would dispose of the whole of the questions arising upon this appeal with the exception of the allegation that, even if the settlement was not originally operative to pass this reversionary interest, it has nevertheless become so by the subsequent actings of Louisa Christian Seaton.

Three matters are relied on in support of that contention. First it is said that she received the income which was provided for her by a family arrangement made in December of the year 1861, which provision she was only to be entitled to in case she married with consent; that, having received that provision from her mother, the tenant for life, she must be taken to have received it upon the basis of the settlement being a valid and binding one, and one which would cover her reversionary interest. I confess that I am unable to follow the reasoning which would suggest that, as a ground for holding that she is disentitled to the claim which she now makes.

The second point is that on the 19th of July, 1873, £5,000 was advanced for her benefit, part of the reversion to which she was entitled, and that that sum of £5,000 was handed to the trustees and became subject to the trusts of the settlement. No question arises here with regard to that £5,000; she makes no claim to it; she does not insist that that is not a sum of money well settled and subject to the trusts of the settlement. But I do not see how the fact that she and her husband concurred in the vesting of that money in the hands of the trustees affects in the least or invalidates her contention that she is now entitled to the remainder of her interest, which fell into possession only after she became a feme sole.

The third matter is that on the 3rd of April, 1875, she concurred in the appointment of new trustees of the settlement and gave a release to the former trustees. That seems to me entirely consistent with her present claim; inasmuch as the £5,000 was well settled new trustees were needed for the £5,000, even if that was the entire amount comprised in the settlement, and the outgoing trustees needed a release in respect of their dealings with the £5,000.

With regard to all those three matters I have this further observation to make, that they occurred during the time when Louisa Christian Seaton was a feme covert; and if she could not by deed, however solemnly executed, dispose during her coverture directly of her reversionary interest, I am quite at a loss to understand how, by any estoppel or actings or otherwise, she can indirectly be held to have disposed of it.

One matter only remains. In 1881 Mrs. Seaton petitioned for a divorce from her husband, and on the 14th of November, 1882, a decree was made absolute for a divorce; so that from that date no doubt she must be treated as a single woman, and after that date she unquestionably had power to dispose as fully of her reversionary interest as if she had never been married; and if she has done any act since that date which has validly disposed of that interest, no doubt she has deprived herself of the right to make the claim which she now insists upon. The appellants rely upon the petition which she presented, after her divorce, to the Divorce Court on the 23rd of November, 1882, and on the order which was made upon it on the 1st of May, 1883.

It appears that prior to her petition for a divorce she had obtained a judicial separation from her husband, and in 1879 an order had been made for the payment to him of a sum of £100 a year out of her income. After the divorce had been obtained she filed a petition containing three prayers; the first, that she might no longer be required to make that payment of £100 a year—that the order for it might be discharged; the second, that he might be ordered to contribute towards the support of herself and the children; and the third that his power of appointment, which he possessed jointly with her under the deed of settlement, might be put an end to. The matter was referred to the registrar of the Divorce Court, and he reported that, looking to the income which she possessed, and to the income which the husband possessed, there was no ground for an order for the payment by him to her for her support, but that he ought to contribute to the maintenance of two of his children. Upon that an order was made by the Divorce Court discharging the order for the payment of £100 a year to him, requiring him to pay £125 a year towards the maintenance of his children, and depriving him of the power which he possessed jointly with her of appointing under the deed of settlement.

That, so far as I know, is the only transaction to which this lady was a party, subsequently to the time when she is to be treated as a feme sole, which has been relied upon as showing that she is now bound by the settlement and disposition which she made with regard to this property which came into possession in 1886. It is put first as an acquiescence in, or confirmation of, the settlement. I cannot understand how any acquiescence or confirmation could at that time be effectual which did not amount to an actual disposition of the property. It was property which at that time was hers, and undisposed of; and I do not see how the steps which she then took amounted in any way to a disposition of it by her as effectual as if she had actually assigned it by deed to the trustees under the settlement.

Nor do I think it can be established that there has been any estoppel against her. At that time no doubt, so far as any disability was concerned, it was at an end; and if it could be shown that she had so acted or made such representations with reference to the existence of this settlement and its application to this reversionary interest as to lead other persons to act upon the faith that the settlement then covered it, so that they would be prejudiced in case it did not cover it, she no doubt might be estopped from denying that the settlement covered the reversionary interest. But it is impossible to say that the application to the Divorce Court had any such effect. Whom did it prejudice? Who relied upon the representations? And, further, how can they be construed as representations at all that the reversionary interest was included in, and effectually dealt with, by the settlement which was referred to? The settlement existed, and was effective and operative, even if it did not touch this reversionary interest at all. I cannot see that she did anything more than bring before the court the settlement; and the court must be presumed to have known that the settlement would only be effectual as far as regarded an interest which a married woman was capable of disposing of.

On all these grounds I think that the judgment of the court below was right, and I move your lordships that it be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord WATSON.—I am of the same opinion, and I agree with every one of the observations which have been made upon the details of this case by my noble and learned friend. The respondents do not admit that Mrs. Seaton's marriage settlement is within the provisions of the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 43, and, seeing that we have not heard their counsel, I refrain from expressing any opinion on the point decided by the Court of Appeal in In re Sampson and Wall. But I am of opinion, with your lordships, that the sole object and effect of the Act of 1855 is to remove disabilities arising from non-age, and that it does not give a minor lady the capacity, during her coverture, to bind her reversionary estate which an adult wife does not possess. In that view the provisions of the Act, assuming that they do apply to the settlement in question, cannot aid the appellants' case.

It was argued, however, by Mr. Marten that the fact of the settlement being executed with the sanction of the Court of Chancery was of itself sufficient to give efficacy to Mrs. Seaton's assignment of her interests in reversion—in other words, that the court meant to give, and actually did give, the minor a power which the law denies to married women. I venture to doubt whether the Court of Chancery is possessed of any such jurisdiction; but it is needless to consider that point, because I am satisfied that in the present case the court merely interfered for the protection of its ward, and intended that the settlement of which it approved should take effect according to its ordinary legal construction, just as if it had been executed by a lady of full age during the subsistence of her marriage.

The appellants lastly contended that Mrs. Seaton has elected to abide by the settlement, or, at least, has estopped herself from claiming against it. It appears to me to be unnecessary to discuss the relevancy of the argument which was addressed to us in support of these pleas, because there are really no facts in the case which can support them.

I have only to add that I entirely concur in the able and exhaustive judgments delivered in this case in the Court of Appeal.

Lord FITZGERALD.—This appeal presents two important questions of construction arising on the 1st section of the Infants' Settlement Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 43).

The first question is whether the decision in the case of Sampson and Wall on the 1st section is correct. It is not necessary for the House to express any opinion on that case so far as relates to that part of the decision which is represented by the judgment of Lord Selborne. It may be a useful decision, and certainly puts a very wide and benevolent construction on the statute; but we leave that case as we find it.

The second question is whether the 1st section went further than to release the infant wife from the disability of infancy.

This question was so fully treated in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and now by Lord Herschell, that I do not find it necessary to say more than that I adopt the judgment of the Court of Appeal, which has been now accepted and approved of by my noble and learned friend. But that leaves untouched the disability arising from the coverture of Louisa Seaton, which could only be removed, as to the property in question, by a deed executed and acknowledged under the provisions of the Act known as Malins' Act, if that Act applied to this case.

Then comes the question which Lord Cairns thus states in Codrington v. Codrington, 24 W. R. 648, L. R. 7 H. L. 854. That, it is true, was a case of election, but he puts it thus:—"It is quite true, as far as the appellant" (that is the wife) "was concerned, the settlement was ineffective." I may observe that it was a settlement of two funds, one of which was her reversionary estate, 60,000 rupees, and she had to elect. He says:—"She had it in her power when discovert to repudiate" the settlement of it, "and to stand on her original rights, or she had it in her power to ratify and confirm" the settlement. We must bear in mind that this settlement now before us, so far as it relates to the reversionary interest of the minor wife in her share of the personal estate of her father, to use the words of Lord Mansfield, had no operation. The instrument was not void or inoperative for all purposes. It bound the husband and his marital rights, but as to her it was ineffective. I assume for the present that, though the settlement was unquestionably void as against the infant wife so far as it dealt with her reversionary estate, yet that she might, when she became discovert, adopt and confirm it. I do not assent the proposition, but assume it. But the acts of confirmation relied on must be clear and unequivocal in their character, amounting in some shape to a gift of her right, and have taken place when she had a full knowledge of her position and of her rights.

Mr. Marten urged that she had knowledge of the settlement and must be taken to have been aware that it was, as to her, inoperative, and that she had a legal right to repudiate and put it aside. That is to say, she must be taken to have had in her mental view the solution of the difficulties which puzzled and misled the Vice-Chancellor, which occupied so much of the time of the Court of Appeal, and are now brought up to this House for final decision. It is true that one of the maxims of the law is Ignorantia juris non excusat. Mr. Marten did not so put it in terms, but his argument amounted to and was based on that. The true meaning of that maxim is that parties cannot excuse themselves from liability for all civil or criminal consequences of their acts by alleging ignorance of the law, but there is no presumption that parties must be taken to know all the legal consequences of their acts, and especially where difficult questions of law or of the practice of the court are involved. Lord Westbury, in Spread v. Morgan, 11 H. L. Cas. 588, 13 W. R. H. L. Dig. 6, dealing with a question of election, thus puts it: "It is true, as a general proposition, that knowledge of the law must be imputed to every person, but it would be too much to impute knowledge of this rule of equity" (the rule which applies to election), "as a question of intention implies knowledge." So here, whether you call it confirmation, ratification, or acquiescence, the act relied on must have taken place with full and complete knowledge. Mrs. Seaton did not become discovert until the judgment of the Divorce Court for the dissolution of the marriage became absolute on the 14th of November, 1882, and her acts of confirmation (if any) must be looked for after that date. Mr. Wilkinson admitted, in answer to a question put to him, that there was but one such act—viz., the petition to the Divorce Court of the 23rd of November, 1882. That petition necessarily recites some of the antecedent matters, including portions of the settlement, and prays for the variation of the settlement by the extinction of certain powers of appointment and interests reserved to the husband, and the rest relates to an order on him to contribute to the support of the children. I entirely concur with my noble and learned friends that there is nothing in that petition or in the report or order on it which can reasonably and fairly be taken as a confirmation by Louisa Seaton of the settlement so far as it related to her reversionary interest in the fund in question.

Lord Macnaghten.—I am surprised that the parties who were unsuccessful in the Court of Appeal should have thought it expedient to come to your lordships' House. To my mind there never was a plainer case or one depending more entirely on elementary principles.

Under her father's will Mrs. Seaton become entitled to a share of personalty, not given for her separate use, and expectant on her mother's death. Her mother is dead, and she now asks for so much of her share as remains unpaid. The answer is, "The fund is no longer hers; it has been assigned to other persons and theirs is the hand to receive it." We turn to the assignment. It is an assignment executed by Mrs. Seaton and by her late husband at a time when the fund was reversionary and the marriage still subsisting. The assignment of the husband is inoperative because he did not reduce the fund into possession during coverture. As the lady was under the disability of coverture, to say nothing of the disability of infancy, the assignment purporting to be made by her is wholly inoperative unless it can be shown that under some statute Mrs. Seaton's assignment had an efficacy which it would not otherwise have possessed. Is there any such statute? The appellants say there is, and they rely on the Infants' Settlements Act. I quite agree with what has been said by my noble and learned friend, that the disability of infancy is the only disability with which that Act deals.

The appellants certainly treat that Act in a very singular manner.

They cut the principal section in two and desire to avail themselves of the first part of the mutilated section which they conceive to be more favourable to them, without waiting for the qualification or explanation which finds its appropriate place at the end of the section. That is a singular way of construing an Act of Parliament.

But the most singular thing about this argument was that the appellants adopt the part of the first section which is not relevant to the present question, and reject that part which is relevant. Mrs. Seaton's application is made in the administration suit. In that suit the court has nothing to do with the trusts of derivative settlements. The only question was, whose is the proper hand to give a receipt? It is on the assignment contained in the settlement, not on the settlement apart from the assignment, that the appellants are compelled to rely; and if there had been any different inference to be drawn from the language of the first part of the section from that to be drawn from the language of the second part (which in my opinion there is not) it is the second part, not the first, which is applicable in the present case.

Then it was said that Mrs. Seaton has confirmed the settlement. The alleged acts of confirmation which are said to have taken place during the coverture may be left out of consideration. It would not have bettered the appellant's case if Mrs. Seaton had re-executed this settlement every day during her coverture. What did Mrs. Seaton do after coverture? She applied to the Divorce Court. In her application she stated the settlement perfectly correctly. The only thing she omitted to do, which it can be suggested she did not do was this: she did not attempt to instruct the Divorce Court on an elementary point of equity law. It would have been irrelevant, if not impertinent, to have done so.

I take leave to say that if this lady had filed a bill to execute the trusts of this settlement it would not have bound her as regards the property not actually paid over to the trustees. There was a settlement. It was a perfectly good settlement so far as related to property reduced into possession during coverture.

It must be borne in mind that there is no question here of election. The husband settled nothing. The wife was entitled to repudiate the settlement which is said to be hers when she became discovert. By so doing she disappointed no one who had contributed to the settlement. She raised no question of election. To confirm the settlement (if that be the proper expression) it would have been necessary for her to have made a new gift. Until a gift be actually perfected, the donor may withdraw.

In the particular circumstances of this case I do not see how the lady could have bound herself unless she had actually assigned her property, or the property had been actually placed by her or with her consent in the hands of the trustees, or she had done some act which would estop her from claiming the fund which was in truth her own.

On these grounds I entirely concur in the motion which has been made.

MILLS v. ARMSTRONG. (a.)

Negligence—Injury to passenger in public conveyance—Injury due partly to those in charge of the conveyance—Doctrine of identification of passenger with those in charge—Ship—Collision—Actions under Lord Campbell's Act in Admiralty Division—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 9.

A passenger in a public conveyance who receives an injury is not deprived of his remedy by reason of the contributory negligence of those in charge of the conveyance. So, where there has been a collision between two ships, contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the one ship is no defence to an action brought under Lord Campbell's Act by the representatives of one of the passengers against the owners of the other ship.

Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, and Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 23 W. R. 295, L. R. 10 Ex. 47, overruled.

The admiralty rule as to joint liability for joint negligence does not apply to actions brought under Lord Campbell's Act for damages arising out of a collision between two ships.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported as The Bernina (No. 2), 35 W. R. 314, 12 P. D. 58, reversing a decision of Butt, J., reported 34 W. R. 595, 11 P. D. 31.

In September, 1884, a collision occurred between The Bernina and The Bushire, in consequence of which Armstrong and Toeg, of The Bushire, were drowned. The accident was caused by the joint fault of the masters and crews of both vessels. Armstrong and Toeg had nothing to do with the navigation of their vessel.

The actions were brought by the personal representatives under Lord Campbell's Act.

J. G. Barnes replied.

Feb. 24.—Lord HERSCHELL.—This appeal arises upon a special case stated in actions in which the respondents are plaintiffs. They are both actions brought under Lord Campbell's Act to recover damages against the appellants for the loss sustained owing to the deaths of the persons of whom the respondents are the personal representatives; and it is alleged that they lost their lives through the negligence of the appellants.

The appellants are the owners of the steamship Bernina, between which vessel and the steamship Bushire a collision took place, which led to the loss of fifteen persons who were on board the latter vessel. It is admitted that the collision was caused by the fault or default of the master and crew of both vessels. J. H. Armstrong, whose administratrix one of the respondents is, was a member of the crew of The Bushire, but had nothing to do with its careless navigation. M. A. Toeg, of whom the other respondent is administratrix, was a passenger on board The Bushire.

The question arises whether, under these circumstances, the appellants are liable. The appellants having, as they admit, been guilty of negligence from which the respondents have suffered loss, a primâ facie case of liability is made out against them. How do they defend themselves? They do not allege that those whom the respondents represent were personally guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident. Nor, again, do they allege that there was contributory negligence on the part of any third person standing in such a legal relation towards the deceased men as to cause the acts of that third person, on principles well settled in our law, to be regarded as their acts, as, e.g., the relation of master and servant, or employer and agent acting within the scope of his authority. But they rest their defence solely upon the ground that those who was navigating the vessels in which the deceased men were being carried were guilty of negligence, without which the disaster would not have occurred. In support of the proposition that this establishes a defence they rely upon the case of Thorogood v. Bryan, which undoubtedly does support their contention. This case was decided as long ago as 1849, and has been followed in some other cases; but though it was early subjected to adverse criticism, it has never come for revision before a Court of Appeal until the present occasion. That action was one brought under Lord Campbell's Act against the owner of an omnibus by which the deceased man was run over and killed. The omnibus in which he had been carried had set him down in the middle of the road instead of drawing up to the kerb, and before he could get out of the way he was run over by the defendant's omnibus, which was coming along at too rapid a pace to be able to pull up. The learned judge directed the jury that "if they were of opinion that want of care on the part of Barber's omnibus in not drawing up to the kerb to put the deceased down, or any want of care on the part of the deceased himself, had been conducive to the injury, in either of these cases, notwithstanding the defendant, by her servant, had been guilty of negligence, their verdict must be for defendant." The jury gave a verdict for the defendant, and the question was then raised, on a rule for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, whether the ruling of the learned judge was right. The court held that it was.

It is necessary to examine carefully the reasoning by which this conclusion was arrived at. Coltman, J., said:—"It appears to me that, having trusted the party by selecting the particular conveyance, the plaintiff has so far identified himself with the owner and his servants that if any injury results from their negligence he must be considered a party to it. In other words, the passenger is so far identified with the carriage in which he is travelling, that want of care of the driver will be a defence of the driver of the carriage which directly caused the accident." Maule and Vaughan Williams, JJ., also dwelt upon this view of the identification of the passenger with the driver of the vehicle in which he is being carried. The former thus expressed himself:—"I incline to think that for this purpose the deceased that he considered as identified with the driver of the omnibus in which he voluntarily became a passenger, and that the negligence of the driver was the negligence of the deceased." Vaughan Williams, J., said:—"I think this passenger must for this purpose be considered as identified with the person having the management of the omnibus he was conveyed by."

With the utmost respect for these eminent judges I must say that I am unable to comprehend this doctrine of identification upon which they lay so much stress. In what sense is the passenger by a public stage-coach, because he avails himself of the accommodation afforded by it, identified with the driver? The learned judges manifestly do not mean to suggest (though some of the language used would seem to bear that construction) that the passenger is so far identified with the driver that the negligence of the latter would render the former liable to third persons injured by it. I presume that they did not even mean that the identification is so complete as to prevent the passenger from recovering against the driver's master; though, if "negligence of the owner's servants is to be substituted negligence of the passenger," or if he "must be constituted a party" to their negligence, it is not easy to see why it would not be a bar to such an action. In short, as far as I can see, the identification appears to be effective only to the extent of enabling another person whose servants have been guilty of negligence to defend himself by the allegation of contributory negligence on the part of the person injured. But the very question that had to be determined was, whether the contributory negligence of the driver of the vehicle was a defence as against the passenger when being another wrongdoer. To say that it is a defence because the passenger is identified with the driver appears to me to beg the question, when it is not suggested that this identification results from any recognised principle of law, or has any other effect than to furnish that defence, the validity of which was the very point in dispute. Two persons may no doubt be so bound together by the legal relation in which they stand to each other that the acts of one may be regarded by the law as the acts of the other. But the relation between the passenger in a public vehicle and the driver of it certainly is not such as to fall within any of the recognised categories in which the act of one man is treated in law as the act of another.

I pass now to the other reasons given for the judgment in Thorogood v. Bryan. Martin, B., says:—"On the part of the plaintiff it is suggested that a passenger in a public conveyance has no control over the driver. But I think that cannot with propriety be said. He enters into a contract with the owner, whom, by his servant, the driver, he employs to drive him. If he is dissatisfied with the mode of conveyance he is not obliged to avail himself of it. But, as regards the present plaintiff, he is not altogether without fault; he chose his own conveyance, and must take the consequences of any default on the part of the driver whom he thought fit to trust."

I confess I cannot concur in this reasoning. I do not think it well founded either in law or in fact. What kind of control has the passenger over the driver which would make it reasonable to hold the former affected by the negligence of the latter? and is it any more reasonable to hold him so affected because he chose the mode of conveyance—that is to say, drove in an omnibus rather than walked, or took the first omnibus that passed him instead of waiting for another? And when it is attempted to apply this reasoning to passengers travelling in steamships or on railways the unreasonableness of such a doctrine is even more glaring.

The only other reason given is contained in the judgment of Cresswell, J., in these words: "If the driver of the omnibus the deceased was in had, by his negligence or want of due care and skill, contributed to an injury from a collision, his master clearly could maintain no action. And I must confess I see no reason why a passenger who employs the driver to convey him stands in any better position." Surely, with deference, the reason for the difference lies on the very surface. If the master in such a case could maintain no action, it is because there existed between him and the driver the relation of master and servant. It is clear that if his driver's negligence alone had caused the collision, he would have been liable to an action for the injury resulting from it to third parties. The learned judge would, I imagine, in that case, have seen a reason why a passenger in the omnibus stood in a better position than the master of the driver. I have now dealt with all the reasons on which the judgment in Thorogood v. Bryan was founded, and I entirely agree with the learned judges in the court below in thinking them inconclusive and unsatisfactory.

I will not detain your lordships further on this part of the case, beyond saying that I concur with the judgments of the learned judges in the court below, and specially with the very exhaustive judgment of Lord Esher, M.R.

It was suggested in the course of the argument that Thorogood v. Bryan might be supported on the ground that the allegation that the negligence which caused the injury was the defendant's was not proved, inasmuch as it was the defendant's negligence in conjunction with that of the driver of the other omnibus. It may be that, as a pleading point, this would have been good. It is not necessary to express an opinion whether it would or not. I do not think it would have been a defence on the merits if the facts had been properly averred. If, by a collision between two vehicles, a person unconnected with either vehicle were injured, the owner of neither vehicle, when sued, could maintain as a defence, "I am not guilty, because, but for the negligence of another person, the accident would not have happened." And I do not see how this defence is any more available as against a person being carried in one of the vehicles, unless the reasoning in Thorogood v. Bryan be well founded.

I have said that the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan has not been unquestioned. I do not think it necessary to enter upon a minute consideration of the subsequent cases, after the careful and accurate examination to which they have been subjected by the Master of the Rolls. The result may be summarized thus: The learned editors of Smith's Leading Cases, Willes and Keating, JJ., strongly questioned the propriety of the decision (in the notes to Ashby v. White, 1 Sm. L. C., 8th ed., 316). Parke, B., whose dictum in Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Co. Williams, J., followed in directing the jury in Thorogood v. Bryan, appears to have doubted the soundness of the judgment in that case. Dr. Lushington, in The Milan, expressed strong disapproval of it; and though in Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. it was followed, and Bramwell and Pollock, BB., to say the least, did not indicate dissatisfaction with it, I understand that my noble and learned friend, Lord Bramwell, after hearing this case argued, and maturely considering it, agrees with the judgment of the court below. In Scotland the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan was pronounced unsatisfactory in Adams v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. In America it has been followed in the courts of some States, but it has often been departed from, and upon the whole the view taken has been decidedly adverse to it. The latest case that I am aware of in that country is Little v. Hacket. That was a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, whose decisions, on account of its high character for learning and ability, are always to be regarded with respect. Field, J., in delivering judgment, examined all the English and American cases, and the conclusion adopted was the same as that at which your lordships have arrived.

I have only this observation to add. The case of Waite v. The North-Eastern Railway Co. was much relied on in the argument for the appellants; but the very learned counsel who argued that case for the defendants, and all the judges who took part in the decision, were of opinion that it was clearly distinguishable from Thorogood v. Bryan, and did not involve a review of that case. I think they were right.

As regards the other questions argued before your lordships, I have only to say that I think they were properly dealt with by the court below.

I am requested by my noble and learned friend Lord Bramwell, who was unable to remain to read the opinion which he had prepared, to state that he concurs in the motion which I am about to make.

I move your lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord Watson.—The appellants conceded in argument that, unless it can be shown that Thorogood v. Bryan is a valid precedent, they cannot succeed in this appeal. Although nearly forty years have elapsed since that case was decided, I think the rule which it established must still be dealt with upon its own merits. The decision has not met with general acceptance, and it cannot be represented as an authority upon which a course of practice has followed, or upon which persons guilty, or intending to be guilty, of contributory negligence are entitled to rely.

When the combined negligence of two or more individuals, who are not acting in concert, results in personal injury to one of them, he cannot recover compensation from the others, for the obvious reason that, but for his own neglect, he would have sustained no harm. Upon the same principle, individuals who are injured, without being personally negligent, are nevertheless disabled from recovering damages if at the time they stood in such a relation to any one of the actual wrongdoers as to imply their responsibility for his act or default. That constructive fault, which implies the liability of those to whom it is imputable to make reparation to an innocent sufferer, must also have the effect of barring all claims at their instance against others who are in pari delicto is a proposition at once intelligible and reasonable. If they are within the incidence of the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se, there can be no reason why it should apply in questions between them and the outside public, and not in questions betweem them and their fellow-wrongdoers. But the facts which were before the court in Thorogood v. Bryan do not appear to me to bring the case within that principle.

My noble and learned friend Lord Bramwell, who is so conversant with the intricacies of English pleading, suggested, in the course of the argument, a technical ground upon which the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan might be justified. In that view the case would not be an authority for the appellants, who accordingly supported the ratio assigned for the judgment, which was simply this, that the deceased passenger, by taking the seat on the omnibus, became so far identified with its driver that the negligence of its driver was imputable to him in any question with the driver or owner of the other omnibus, which ran over him, and was the immediate cause of his death. Coltman and Cresswell, JJ., express themselves in terms which, if literally understood, would lead to the conclusion that he would also have been responsible for damage solely attributable to the fault of the driver. Coltman, J., said, "Having trusted the party, by selecting the particular conveyance, the plaintiff has so far identified himself with the owner and her servants that, if any injury results from their negligence, he must be considered a party to it." Maule, J., was careful to limit his observations to the case before him. "I incline to think," said the learned judge, "that for this purpose (i.e., recovering damages from the defendant) the deceased must be considered as identified with the owner of the omnibus in which he voluntarily became a passenger, and that the negligence of the driver was the negligence of the deceased."

I do not think the very eminent judges who decided Thorogood v. Bryan intended to affirm that the deceased, by taking his seat in the omnibus, incurred the same responsibility for the negligent acts of the driver as if the latter had been his servant. If they did mean to do so, their conclusion might be perfectly logical, but their premises would be directly at variance with the principles laid down in Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499, which I have always regarded, and still regard, as a sound and authoritative precedent. If they did not, then they have affirmed that a passenger, travelling by a public conveyance, may be so unconnected with the driver as to be exempt from liability for his negligence, and yet be so identified with him as to lose all right of action against wrongdoers, whose negligence, in combination with that of the driver, has occasioned personal injury to himself. That is a proposition which it is very difficult to understand. It must be a singular kind of relationship, and created by very exceptional circumstances, which results in the superior being affected by his inferiors' negligence in a question with wrongdoers, and not in a question with persons who are themselves free from blame.

It humbly appears to me that the identification upon which the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan is based has no foundation in fact. I am of opinion that there is no relation constituted between the driver of an omnibus and its ordinary passengers which can justify the inference that they are identified, to any extent whatever, with his negligence. He is the servant of the owner, not their servant; he does not look to them for orders, and they have no right to interfere with his conduct of the vehicle, except, perhaps, the right of remonstrance when he is doing, or threatens to do, something that is wrong and inconsistent with their safety. Practically they have no greater measure of control over his actions than the passenger in a railway train has over the conduct of the engine-driver. I am, therefore, unable to assent to the principle upon which the case of Thorogood v. Bryan rests. In my opinion an ordinary passenger by an omnibus or by a ship is not affected, either in a question with contributory wrongdoers or with innocent third parties, by the negligence, in the one case, of the driver, and in the other of the master and crew by whom the ship is navigated, unless he actually assumes control over their actions, and thereby occasions mischief. In that case he must, of course, be responsible for the consequences of his interference.

Counsel for the appellants endeavoured to support Thorogood v. Bryan upon a totally different principle from that assigned by the learned judges who decided the case. They argued alternatively that the maxim Respondeat superior does not apply, and that passengers are affected by the wrongful acts of the driver, not because he is in any sense their servant or subject to their control, but by reason of their being, for the time, under his dominion.

Waite v. North-Eastern Railway Co. was the authority relied on in support of this branch of the argument. But there is no analogy between the position of an infant incapable of taking care of itself and that of a passenger sui juris; and the theory that an adult passenger places himself under the guardianship of the driver, so as to be affected by his negligence, appears to me to be absolutely without foundation either in fact or law.

I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I concur in the motion which has been proposed and in the reasons upon which it has been founded.

ELLINGTON v. CLARK, BUNNETT, & Co. (a.)

Practice—Evidence—Appeal—Copy of judge's notes—Shorthand notes of evidence taken by solicitor's clerk—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 11.

When any question of fact is involved in an appeal the evidence as to which has been given orally in the court below, it is the duty of the appellant to apply to one of the judges of the Court of Appeal, through his clerk, to ask the judge from whom the appeal comes to send a copy of his notes to the Court of Appeal. If the appellant has not so applied, the appeal will be ordered to stand over at the appellant's expense.

Shorthand notes of evidence in the court below, taken by an independent professional shorthand writer, may be referred to on the hearing of an appeal, but the Court of Appeal will not allow shorthand notes of evidence taken by a clerk of one of the solicitors in the action to be in any way referred to.

Appeal from Kay, J.

This was an action to restrain the infringement of a patent. At the trial of the action in the court below much of the evidence had been given orally. No notes of the evidence so given had been taken by a professional shorthand writer, but shorthand notes of it had been taken by clerks of the solicitors engaged in the action, and these notes were referred to on the appeal.

No application had been made by the appellant for a copy of the judge's notes for the use of the Court of Appeal.

R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 11, provides that "when any question of fact is involved in an appeal, the evidence taken in the court below bearing on such question shall, subject to any special order, be brought before the Court of Appeal as follows . . . (b.) as to any evidence given orally, by the production of a copy of the judge's notes, or such other materials as the court may deem expedient."

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Moulton, Q.C., and Micklem, for the plaintiffs.

Rigby, Q.C., and T. Terrell, for the defendants.

COTTON, L.J.—We wish it to be understood that hereafter we shall not allow shorthand notes of evidence taken by a clerk of either of the solicitors in the action to be in any way referred to. Such notes are not to be relied upon. I do not suppose that the clerk would be guilty of intentional dishonesty, but it is impossible for him to help being unconsciously biassed by his wish that the evidence should turn out in a particular way. A note by a professional shorthand writer, who is independent, stands in a different position. It is the duty of the appellant to apply to one of the judges of the Court of Appeal, through his clerk, to ask the judge from whom the appeal is to send a copy of his notes to the Court of Appeal. It is to be understood that in future when the appellant has not so applied for a copy of the judge's notes we shall order the appeal to stand over to allow of the application being made. Fry, L.J., suggests, and I agree, that this standing over should be at the expense of the appellant if he has not previously made the application.

FRY and LOPES, L.JJ., concurred.

Arbitration—Agreement to refer—Power to revoke submission—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), s. 17.

A contract for the execution of certain works provided that any dispute arising thereunder should be referred to a particular arbitrator; and it also provided that, so far as applicable, the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, should apply to the arbitration agreed to. By section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, every agreement or submission to arbitration by consent in writing may be made a rule of court on the application of either party. Disputes arising under the contract were referred to arbitration by one of the parties, and thereupon the other party revoked the submission.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the clause in the contract applying the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, amounted to an agreement in the submission that the submission should be made a rule of court within 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39, and that therefore the submission was not revocable at the will of either party.

Motion to set aside an award on the ground that the submission to arbitration was revoked before the award was made.

In May, 1882, Messrs. Mitchell & Izard entered into a contract with the Crown agents for the colonies on behalf of the Governor of Ceylon to construct certain waterworks at Colombo. By the contract any difference or dispute arising thereunder was, on the demand in writing of either party, to be referred to the sole arbitration and award of the consulting engineer appointed by the Governor of Ceylon, whose decision should be final. By clause 85, "'As far as the same are applicable and not hereby varied, the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, or any statutory modification thereof for the time being in force with reference to the settlement of disputes by arbitration, shall apply to the arbitration agreed to by these presents." Disputes having arisen under the contract, they were referred, on the demand in writing of the governor, to the arbitration of the consulting engineer. The contractors protested and refused to appear on the arbitration, and on the 31st of October, 1887, revoked the submission to arbitration. The arbitrator went on with the arbitration in the absence of the contractors, and made his award on the 9th of February, 1888. The contractors thereupon moved to set aside the award.

July 2.—The judgment of the Court (CAVE and A. L. SMITH, JJ.) was read by CAVE, J.—This is an application to set aside an award on the ground that the submission to arbitration was revoked before the award was made. At common law the submission could be revoked at any time before the award was made; but 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39, provides that a submission to arbitration containing an agreement that such submission shall be made a rule of court is not revocable without the leave of the court, and the question for us is whether the submission in this case contains such an agreement. The 17th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, provides that every submission to arbitration by consent in writing may be made a rule of court, unless the submission contains words purporting that the parties intend that it should not be made a rule of court. The effect of this section was discussed in Mills v. Bayley, 11 W. R. 593, 2 H. & C. 36, in which it was held that this section had not the effect of inserting in the agreement a clause empowering it to be made a rule of court, or in other words, that this statutory power was not the same thing in effect as an agreement that the submission should be made a rule of court. This decision was followed by the Court of Common Pleas in In re Rouse and Meier, 19 W. R. 488, L. R. 6 C. P. 212, and by the Court of Appeal in Fraser v. Ehrensperger, 32 W. R. 240, 12 Q. B. D. 310. In the case before us, however, the agreement contains a clause that, "as far as the same are applicable and are not hereby varied, the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, shall apply to the arbitration agreed to in these presents." Now it seems to us that the clause has the effect of inserting in the agreement all the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which are applicable to such a reference, and are not varied by the agreement itself. Among the provisions so applicable is section 17, enabling the agreement to be made a rule of court, unless it contain words purporting that the parties intend it should not be made a rule of court. The parties, therefore, had power to exclude this clause, and as they have not done so, but, on the contrary, have, as we think, expressed their intention that it should apply, there is, in effect, according to our judgment, an agreement in this submission that the document should be made a rule of court within the statute of Will. 4. For these reasons we are of opinion that the application should be refused, with costs.

Application refused.

July 25.—Finlay, Q.C., and Reginald Brown, for the appellants.—The provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, being part of the general law, apply to references without any incorporating clause. The clause is therefore surplusage, and is useless. It was decided in Mills v. Bayley, and in In re Rouse and Meier, that the statutory power to make the submission a rule of court given by section 17 of the Act of 1854 is not equivalent to the agreement of the parties to that effect so as to bring the case within 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39, and that the submission was still revocable. Therefore it makes no difference whether section 17 is incorporated or not, and the power of revocation still exists. Secondly, section 39 of the Act of Will. 4 only applies where the parties have agreed that such submission "shall be made" a rule of court. By section 17 of the Act of 1854 every submission "may be made" a rule of court. The two things are not the same, and so the incorporation of section 17 is not equivalent to an agreement that the submission "shall be made" a rule of court, section 17 being merely permissive. They also contended that 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39, only applied where the parties had agreed to make the submission a rule of a particular court (9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, s. 1), and section 17 of the Act of 1854 did not specify any particular court; and that the sections of the Act of 1854 which were incorporated were those relating to procedure in the arbitration, of which section 17 was not one.

Deutsche Springstoff Actien Gesellschaft v. Brown, ante, p. 557, 20 Q. B. D. 173, was referred to.

J. G. Wood (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., with him, for the Governor of Ceylon.—The words in section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, "may be made" a rule of court have the same effect as "shall be made" in section 39 of the Act of Will. 4. These latter words only mean "may at the option of either party." One party cannot compel the other to make the submission a rule of court. It is like the case of a lease, where a provision that in certain events the lease shall be void means that one of the parties may treat it as void. Next, the clause incorporating the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, is not useless. In re Rouse and Meier shows that to bring the case within section 39 of the Act of Will. 4 the agreement that the submission shall be made a rule of court must be found within the four corners of the document. In this case that is so by the express incorporation of section 17 of the Act of 1854. The submission, therefore, is not revocable. [He was not called upon to answer the other points.]

Finlay, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30.—LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court dismissing an application to set aside an award, the ground of the application being that the submission to arbitration had been duly revoked. The question raised is whether there was power to revoke the submission, and that depends upon the conjoined effect of two sections in two Acts of Parliament and clause 85 in the agreement. The two statutory enactments are section 39 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, and section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. The Divisional Court held that, by reason of the clause in the agreement, the submission was not capable of revocation at the will of either of the parties. It is clear that under section 39 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, if the document upon its true construction does really contain an agreement that the submission shall be made a rule of court, there is no power to revoke the submission; but if that is not its true construction there is power in either party to revoke. It was decided in In re Rouse and Meier and in Thomson v. Anderson, 16 W. R. 48, L. R. 9 Eq. 523, that the mere fact that section 17 of the Act of 1854 enables the submission to be made a rule of court does not affect the power of either party to revoke the submission. It is clear also that if the parties have expressly agreed that the submission shall be made a rule of court, the submission cannot be revoked. Having made these preliminary observations, it is necessary now to consider clause 35 of the agreement, and what its true meaning is. Mr. Finlay urged that the clause amounted to nothing at all, and that its whole effect was to call the attention of the parties to the fact that there were certain sections of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, applicable to arbitrations. He used an argument to this effect, that it was now established that under the Act of 1854 a submission to arbitration was still revocable, and that it would be absurd to say that the submission was rendered irrevocable by simply saying in the agreement that the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, should apply. That argument seems to me more plausible than sound. The true answer to it is that the parties, by agreeing to make the provisions of the Act of 1854 applicable, agree to bring the submission within section 39 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, and there seems to me to be no difference between agreeing that the submission "may be made" a rule of court and that it "shall be made" a rule of court. I have taken some pains to look into the precedents of agreements for reference to arbitration, and I have come to the conclusion that the object of inserting this clause in the agreement is to comply with the provisions of section 39 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42; and unless we held this to be so the clause would be a nullity. I am of opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and must be affirmed.

Negligence—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-section 2, 3; s. 8—Person intrusted with superintendence—Foreman of gang of labourers.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as one of a gang of labourers, of whom B. was the foreman, in stowing bales of wool in the hold of a ship. B. was himself a labourer, but stood at the top of the hatchway to signal to the men below when a bale was about to be lowered. The plaintiff was injured by a bale being lowered, as he alleged, without warning from B.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 335), that there was no evidence that the injury resulted from the negligence of any person having "any superintendence intrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence," or from "the negligence of any person to whose orders the plaintiff was bound to conform while conforming to the said orders" within the meaning of section 1, sub-sections 2 and 3, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Hawkins and A. L. Smith, JJ.) reported ante, p. 335, 19 Q. B. D. 585.

The action was brought in the county court under the Employers' Liability Act to recover compensation for injuries.

The plaintiff was employed with other workmen by the defendant to assist in stowing bales of wool on board the defendant's ship. The workmen were divided into gangs, with a foreman to each gang. The foreman of the plaintiff's gang was a man named Bodfield. The bales had to be hauled across the deck and dropped down a hatchway for the purpose of being stowed away below. The plaintiff was occupied in stowing the bales away below, while Bodfield, who was assisting to haul the bales across the deck, gave the signals to the men below before the bales were dropped down the hatchway. The plaintiff was injured by a bale which, as he said, was dropped down the hatchway without any warning. The county court judge nonsuited the plaintiff, and his decision was upheld by the Divisional Court on the ground that there was no evidence that Bodfield was a person having superintendence intrusted to him within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 2, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

The plaintiff appealed.

Weddenburn and C. G. Ellis, for the appellant.

Tatlock, for the respondent.

The arguments were the same as in the court below.

The following additional case was cited:—Wright v. Wallis, 3 Times Law Rep. 779.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It appears to me that this appeal cannot succeed. The case is of no authority, and turns entirely on the evidence. The plaintiff had no case under the 2nd sub-section of section 1, because it is clear from the evidence that Bodfield was not a person intrusted with superintendence within the meaning of that sub-section. Section 8 provides that the superintendence referred to in that section must be that of a person whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence, and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour. The evidence, on the contrary, shows that Bodfield was ordinarily engaged in manual labour, and was actually so engaged when the accident happened. The case, therefore, does not come within section 1, sub-section 3, because the plaintiff was not injured while conforming to the orders of a person to whose orders he was bound to conform. But there again the evidence is all the other way. The plaintiff was never ordered to stand under the bale when it fell. On the contrary, the evidence shows that the orders which were from time to time given were to stand clear of the hatchway. He was, therefore, not conforming to any express or implied order when the accident happened, and he has no more case under sub-section 3 than he has under sub-section 2.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think all that can be said is exhausted by the elaborate judgment of A. L. Smith, J., in the Divisional Court. It is impossible on the evidence to come to any other conclusion. I will only add that the case of Wright v. Wallis is no authority, as we there thought the facts had not been sufficiently investigated, and we remitted the case to the county court for that reason only.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think it is a very plain case.

WALSH v. WHITELEY. (a.)

Master and servant—Negligence—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-section 1; s. 2, sub-section 1—"Defect in condition of machinery"—Machine dangerous to workman.

Per Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting).—The mere fact that a machine is dangerous to the workmen using it does not constitute a "defect in the condition of the machine" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

The plaintiff was employed at a carding machine at the defendants' mill. In the machine was a vertical wheel which revolved upon a bed-plate, and in the vertical surface of the wheel there were large holes. It was the plaintiff's duty to place a leather band over the wheel while in motion. Upon the occasion in question, while engaged in putting the band on the wheel, the plaintiff's thumb was caught in one of holes and was cut off. There was evidence that the holes were dangerous and of no use except to lessen the weight of the wheel, and the defendants had carding machines both with solid and open wheels. The machine had been in use for many years without any accident happening, and no complaint had been made.

Held, by Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that there was no evidence of any "defect in the condition of the machine" for which the defendants were liable within section 1, sub-section 1, and section 2, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division in an action under section 1, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, brought in the Blackburn County Court.

It appeared that the plaintiff was a grinder employed at a carding machine at the defendants' mill. In the machine there was a vertical wheel which revolved upon a horizontal bed-plate, and in the vertical surface of the wheel there were holes. Part of the plaintiff's duty was to place a leather band over the circumference of the wheel, and this could only be done while the wheel was in motion. While doing this upon the occasion in question the plaintiff's thumb was caught in one of the holes in the surface of the wheel and cut off.

It appeared from the evidence that the machine had been in use for ten years; that the holes were for the purpose of making the wheel light; and that the defendants had carding machines both with open and solid wheels. The plaintiff had been a grinder for thirteen years, and had been in the defendants' employment for eight months, and had never complained, and no complaint had been made, of the open wheels. In his evidence the plaintiff said that the open wheels were never so close to the bed-plate as in this machine, and three witnesses said that the holes in the wheel were dangerous, and were of no use.

The question raised was whether there was a defect in the condition of the machine which rendered the defendants liable, and the county court judge told the jury that to be defective it must be such as a reasonable, careful, experienced man, reasonably careful of the safety of his hands, would not use. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £30.

In the Divisional Court Wills, J., was of opinion that there was evidence to go to the jury, Grantham, J., held that there was not. The judgment for the plaintiff therefore stood.

The defendants appealed.

Wheeler, Q.C., and E. Bray, for the defendants.—The machine was properly constructed, and it was fit for the purpose for which it was used. These machines are now more frequently made with solid wheels, and they would probably be safer, but it is not evidence of negligence in an employer not to adopt the latest form of machine. The combined effect of section 1, sub-section 1, and section 2, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, is that there must be not only a defect in the condition of the machine, but also negligence in the employer in connection therewith. There was no evidence of that here. There was only evidence that the machine was dangerous, but that is not sufficient, as most machines are dangerous, and this machine had been used for years without accident or complaint. The Act has placed the workman in a position as advantageous, but no better, than that of the rest of the world who use the master's premises at his invitation on business: per Bowen, L.J., in Thomas v. Quartermaine, 35 W. R., at p. 557, 18 Q. B. D., at p. 693. In Crafter v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 14 W. R. 334, L. R. 1 C. P. 300, where the plaintiff fell on the stairs, which were edged with brass, the court held that there was no evidence of negligence, though two witnesses said that in their opinion the staircase was dangerous by reason of the brass nosings and the absence of a handrail.

T. W. Chitty (Bigham, Q.C., with him) for the plaintiff.—There was evidence that the machine was defective. A "defect" in the condition of the machine is something producing danger to the workman using it. The machine was not suitable for the purpose for which it was being used at the time of the injury—viz., the putting on the strap—by reason of the holes in the wheel. The case, therefore, comes within the decisions in Hale v. Samuelson, 32 W. R. 595, 12 Q. B. D. 30; Cripps v. Judge, 33 W. R. 35, 13 Q. B. D. 583; Paley v. Garnett, 34 W. R. 295, 16 Q. B. D. 52; and Weblin v. Ballard, 34 W. R. 455, 17 Q. B. D. 122.

E. Bray replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 19.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—Before coming to the facts of this particular case I think it necessary to make one or two preliminary observations which are material to show the grounds of my judgment. There have always been two schools of thought in cases of injury to workmen. Some judges have considered chiefly that injustice might be done to masters in holding them responsible. Others have considered that masters and workmen were not really upon an equal footing, inasmuch as if there was danger in the employment, it did not exist with regard to the masters but only with regard to the workmen, and that consequently the workmen must either give up their employment or take the risk. Those two views were laid before the committee of the House of Commons which sat to inquire into the subject, the one school thinking that the law as laid down by the judges was a just law, the other thinking that it was unfair to the workmen and ought to be altered. It was upon these conflicting views that the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, was passed. That Act, as its title shows, was passed in favour of workmen, and to extend the liability of masters. Since the passing of that statute I cannot help thinking that the same line of thought has been in operation. Some judges have construed the statute strictly so as not to inflict any injustice on masters. Other judges have construed it liberally in favour of the workmen. I myself have always belonged to the latter school. The former school have, in my opinion, been too bold in interfering with verdicts of juries.

Coming to the present case, two questions arise for our decision. The first question is, How far ought the court to interfere with the verdict of the jury? The second question is, What is the true construction of the statute? As to the first, the jury must be taken to have found that the machine was defective in this sense, that it was dangerous to the workmen using it. We are asked to say that their verdict was wrong on the ground that there was no evidence that the machine was dangerous, and dangerous by reason of the negligence of the employer. It was argued that there could not be negligence on the part of the employer, because, as was said, there was no other better known form of machine at the time. That view seems to me to be erroneous. The question seems to me to be whether the machine is dangerous, and whether a careful consideration would show it to be dangerous.

In my opinion it is no answer to say that though the employer used a machine that was dangerous, no better machine had up to that time been invented. I am prepared to say that if a careful consideration would show the employer that the machine was dangerous to the workmen using it, even though the machine could not be improved upon, the employer ought not to use it, or, if he does, he can only do so subject to a liability to pay compensation to the workmen. And if on a careful consideration by the employer or by skilled persons an improvement could be made in the machine, that would be stronger to show that there was negligence in the employer using it. In the present case the machine had been some years in use. An alteration in the machines had been subsequently brought into use. The jury accordingly had to consider whether the machine was defective in the sense of being dangerous to the workmen using it, and whether or not the employer, by the exercise of ordinary care, must have known it to be dangerous. The jury have answered both those questions in favour of the plaintiff. I accept that verdict as not unreasonable, and I am not prepared to set it aside. It seems to me that both the learned judges in the Divisional Court accepted it, but differed upon the construction of the statute.

Upon the question of the construction of the statute, it is said that there is no defect in the condition of the machine if it is fit for the purpose for which it is used, even though it be dangerous to the workmen using it. Remembering that this is a statute passed in favour of workmen and for their greater safety, I do not think that, in considering what is a defective machine, we can confine the consideration to the question of the purpose for which it is used. The defect contemplated by the Act is not in the purpose for which the machine is used. That is not the test. The defect lies solely in there being danger to the workmen using it. The purpose for which a machine is used is wholly immaterial, and, in my opinion, the defect solely pointed at by the Act is a defect which touches the safety of the workmen, and that may either be in the original construction of the machine or in the use to which the machine is put. No question is raised as to misdirection if there was evidence to go to the jury, nor as to negligence on the part of the plaintiff. In my opinion, therefore, the verdict ought to stand, and the appeal should be dismissed.

The judgment of LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., was read by LOPES, L.J.—This case raises a most important question under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. In the court below the learned judges differed, Wills, J., holding the decision of the county court judge right, Grantham, J., holding it wrong. We agree with the judgment of Grantham, J., and disagree with the judgment of Wills, J., and the Master of the Rolls.

The question is whether there was any evidence of "any defect in the condition of the machinery" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act. We think there was not. To determine the meaning of the words "defect in the condition of the machinery" we must look, not only at section 1, sub-section 1, but also at section 2, sub-section 1. Reading those sections and sub-sections together, we think there must be a defect implying negligence in the employer. The negligence of the employer appears to be a necessary element without which the workman is not to be entitled to any compensation or remedy. It must be a defect in the condition of the machine, having regard to the use to which it is to be applied or to the mode in which it is to be used. It may be a defect either in the original construction of the machine, or a defect arising from its not being kept up to the mark; but it is essential that there should be evidence of negligence of the employer or some person in his service intrusted with the duty of seeing that the machine is in proper condition. It must be a defect in the original construction or subsequent condition of the machine rendering the machine unfit for the purposes to which it is applied when used with reasonable care and caution, and a defect arising from the negligence of the employer. What evidence is there of this? Is there any evidence of the machine being defective, even in the abstract? It was perfect in all respects. It was not impaired by use. It had been properly kept up to the mark. The only suggestion is that the wheel, which might have been solid, had holes in it, and that if the wheel had been solid the plaintiff could not have put his thumb where he did, and the accident would not have happened. It was also suggested that the wheel was too close to the table, and that had the wheel and table been further apart the accident could not have happened. There was, however, no evidence worth mentioning of improper construction in this respect. But the plaintiff had used the same kind of machine for thirteen years and had sustained no injury. It is, to our mind, clear that he would have suffered no injury on the present occasion if he had used proper care and caution.

In these circumstances we can see no evidence of any defect in the condition of the machine, even apart from negligence of the employer. It may be that a solid wheel would have been safer, but it would be placing an intolerable burden on employers to hold that they are to adopt every fresh improvement in machinery. We do not believe that such was the intention of the Legislature, nor do we think it was intended to relieve workmen from the exercise of that care and caution without which most machinery is dangerous.

But in our opinion the defect in the condition of the machinery must be such as to show negligence on the part of the employer. It seems to us that in this case there is not a particle of evidence of any defect arising from the negligence of the employer. It was a machine generally used—used by the plaintiff for thirteen years without any complaint or mischief arising—perfect and unimpaired, and never thought by the plaintiff himself to be unsafe. It is said there is evidence of the machine being dangerous. So are most machines, so is even an ordinary sharp knife unless used with care, but that does not make it defective in its condition, nor does it imply negligence in the employer, if an accident happens, who furnishes it to his workmen for them to use with reasonable care.

The authorities cited in nowise conflict with the conclusion at which we have arrived. They are all cases where there was evidence of a defect showing negligence of the employer. In Heske v. Samuelson the lift was good, but there was negligence in not providing what was necessary to prevent the coke falling off; the machine was defective as used for coke. In Cripps v. Judge the ladder was used for a purpose for which it was unfit, and was so used under the personal superintendence of one of the defendants. In Weblin v. Ballard there was evidence that the ladder was not in a proper condition for the purpose for which it was used, and that the employer knew this. In Thomas v. Quartermaine, there was no defect, and it was held there must be a defect showing negligence in the employer in order to bring the case within the Act. In Yarmouth v. France, ante, p. 281, 19 Q. B. D. 647, it was vice in the horse which was complained of, which was known to the defendants' manager.

In this case, then, in our opinion, there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury. The learned county court judge ought to have nonsuited the plaintiff, or have directed a verdict for the defendants. If our view is wrong it will follow that whenever a workman uses a dangerous machine and is injured by it without any negligence on the part of the employer, the latter is responsible for the injury, unless he can prove negligence on the part of the workman himself. We cannot construe the Act as warranting any such conclusion. The Act is not directed against dangerous machines, but against the negligence of employers. With regard to the general observations of the Master of the Rolls on the Employers' Liability Act, we say that we agree with him that the Act was passed in favour of the workman, and we are ready to give the workman every benefit to which he is entitled under this Act, but we feel bound to construe the Act according to the meaning which we think it bears, and was intended to bear.

We think the appeal must be allowed.

HENNESSY v. WRIGHT (No. 1). (a.)

Practice—Particulars—Libel action.

Defendant published articles alleging that the plaintiff, who was Governor of Mauritius, had been charged by members of the council with sending to the Colonial Office garbled reports of their speeches. The articles were also alleged by the plaintiff to impute that he had in fact transmitted such garbled accounts.

An action for libel having been brought, defendant pleaded that the alleged libels were true in substance and in fact.

Held, that plaintiff was entitled to further and better particulars, it not being clear whether the defence meant that what was charged against the plaintiff had been truly reported or that what was reported to have been charged was in fact true.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Divisional Court ordering the defendant to give particulars of the facts relied upon as justification for the alleged libels.

This was an action for libel brought by Sir John Pope Hennessy, Governor of the Mauritius, against the publisher of the Times newspaper.

The alleged libels were contained in certain articles published in the Times with reference to a meeting of the Council of the Government of the Mauritius which took place on the 19th of April, 1888. In these articles it was said that certain members of the council had charged the Governor with transmitting to the Colonial Office a report of the speeches delivered at the meeting without having submitted them to the speakers, and also with editing—that is, tampering with—the report. Some of the language used in the articles might also bear the interpretation that the plaintiff had in fact tampered with the report, and that meaning was put upon it by the plaintiff in the innuendoes charged by him in his statement of claim.

The defendant, in his defence, denied that the articles could bear the meaning put upon them, or any meaning defamatory to the plaintiff. He also pleaded as justification that the alleged libels were published bonâ fide and without malice, and were parts of fair and accurate accounts and reports of public proceedings in the Council of Government of the colony; that they were fair and reasonable comments upon matters of public interest and notoriety and published bonâ fide and without malice and under such circumstances as to render the publication privileged; and, lastly, that the alleged libels "were and are true in substance and in fact."

The defendant had obtained a commission to take evidence in the Island of Mauritius, and in the meantime the plaintiff applied at chambers for an order that the defendant should give particulars of the facts relied upon as justification of the libels complained of. Denman, J., refused the application. The plaintiff then appealed to the Divisional Court, and on May 15 the appeal was allowed, the court holding that the plaintiff was entitled to know before the trial what it was that the defendant meant by pleading that the alleged libels were true in substance and in fact, whether he meant that he had truly reported what was said, or that what he reported to have been said was true, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the particulars for which he asked.

The defendant now appealed from that decision.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., William Graham, and Albert Bower, in support of the appeal, contended that the pleading was wide enough to cover both the alternative meanings of the defence. The jury would say whether the alleged libel was true and then the defendants would be prepared to justify.

Cagney (with whom was Lockwood, Q.C.), contra, cited Behrens v. Allen, 8 Jur. N. S. 118; D'Anson v. Stuart, 1 T. R. 752; Duncan v. Thwaites, 3 B. & C. 556; Gourley v. Plimsell, 21 W. R. 683, L. R. 8 C. P. 362; and Bullen and Leake's Precedents in Pleading, 2nd ed., p. 612.

COTTON, L.J.—I think the Divisional Court was right. The object of particulars is to enable both parties to go to trial with knowledge of what they have to meet. Here is a plea which, according to the present system of pleading, cannot be said to be a bad plea. "The alleged libels respectively were and are true in substance and in fact." That covers both questions: whether the report of what took place is true, and whether the facts charged against the plaintiff during those debates are true. In my opinion, in order to enable the plaintiff to be prepared with evidence when he goes to trial, he ought to know what the defendant really means by that. Does he mean only that he has given a correct report of what took place? Or does he mean that the facts charged against the plaintiff are, in fact, true? It is said that the defendant intends to justify whatever the jury may find to be the true meaning of the libel. That cannot be ascertained till the time for giving evidence at the trial is passed, and how, in that case, the plaintiff could know what he has to meet I cannot say.

Without going into any technical details about the old and present form of pleading, in my opinion the order was right, because it would enable the plaintiff to go to trial with the knowledge of what he has to defend himself against. Before the court below Mr. Lockwood said: "We are quite content if we know whether they intend to say the report is a true one, or whether they also intend to contend that the facts charged against the plaintiff were true." That, I think, will be a sufficient compliance with the order.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and, speaking broadly, for the reasons given by the Lord Justice. I think it is necessary for the purpose of justice that the plaintiff, some time before the trial, should know whether it is going to be said against him that he did alter these reports or whether it is not. The defendant says he has told him already in his pleadings; but the difficulty is that he has told him in such a way that, although a lawyer might perhaps understand that that was so, yet he has not told him in such a way that when the trial comes on a cloud may not be thrown over it by some ingenious counsel contending that he had never meant to justify the truth of the libels, but only to say that what he had published was a correct report of what took place. Technically, I think, according to the rules, these particulars ought to be given. What was the way in which justification was pleaded under the former system, that is to say, after the year 1852, when the statement of claim set out a libel without an innuendo? The justification generally used to be by pleading justification of the words without colloquium, and then by pleading justification of the words with it. What the defendant has done here is to put the two into one plea. I do not object to that formally, provided it works no injustice; but in this case it might work injustice to have a joinder of the two defences in one form of words (because there are two separate defences), and might, I think, unless you protect the plaintiff by particulars, deprive him of that very right to particulars which the Judicature Act and Rules meant to give him. Ord. 29, r. 7, is as follows:—"Where the plaintiff seeks relief in respect of several distinct claims or causes of complaint founded upon separate and distinct grounds, they shall be stated as far as may be separately and distinctly, and the same rule shall apply where the defendant relies upon several distinct grounds of defence, set off, or counter-claim founded upon separate and distinct facts." Now this is a case in which the two defences, though put together in one plea, really are distinct grounds of defence and founded on separate and distinct facts; and if we were bound by the hard and fast line, this is a case in which the plaintiff would have had a right, it seems to me, to have the grounds of defence stated separately and distinctly. That has not been done. It may be said on behalf of the defendant that that is an objection to the pleading. Yes, but objections to pleadings have always from time immemorial been cured, when the objection was to the generality of the plea, by delivery of particulars. This is an apt way in the common law division of curing the objection caused by the generality of the plea.

It seems to me, therefore, that the order for particulars is based upon good practice, and certainly is required by the justice of the case.

Fry, L.J.—I agree, though not without doubt.

Hennessy v. Wright (No. 2). (a.)

Practice—Interrogatories—Action of libel against publisher of newspaper—Report of public proceedings and fair comment—Disclosure of name of newspaper correspondent—Disclosure of original manuscript.

In an action against the publisher of a newspaper for a libel contained in a letter from a correspondent and in a leading article thereon, the defence was that the alleged libel consisted of an accurate report of certain public proceedings and fair comment thereon.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to interrogate the defendant as to the names of the persons on whose information the reports were based, or the name of the correspondent who wrote the letter, or as to the original manuscript of the letter.

Appeal from the refusal of a divisional court to order the defendant to make further answers to certain interrogatories.

The action was for libel, and was brought by Sir John Pope Hennessy, the Governor of Mauritius, against the publisher of the Times newspaper. The libel complained of was contained in a letter from a correspondent at Mauritius and in a leading article commenting thereon, which were alleged by the plaintiff to mean that he, as governor, had been charged by members of the council of the colony with having "edited"—that is, tampered with—the reports of certain speeches delivered by them, and with having transmitted reports of such speeches to the Secretary of State for the Colonies in a garbled form. The defendant pleaded that the alleged libels were parts of fair and accurate accounts and reports of public proceedings of the council of the colony, and fair and reasonable comments upon matters of public interest and notoriety, and were published bonâ fide and without malice, and under such circumstances as to render the publication privileged; and that the alleged libels were true in substance and in fact.

The plaintiff administered to the defendant interrogatories, the substance of which, so far as it is necessary to state them in this report, was as follows:—(1) Say to the best of your information and belief from what person or persons was the information obtained upon which the alleged fair and accurate accounts and reports were respectively based. (2) Give to the best of your knowledge, information, or belief the name of the person or persons by whom the reports were made, and of the person who sent them to the Times. (3) Had the person from whom the reports were obtained any previous connection with the Times as correspondent or otherwise? (4) Give the name of the person who wrote or contributed the letter or article headed Port Louis, 3rd of August, published in the Times of the 25th of August, 1886. (5) Was or was not the communication in the last interrogatory mentioned the first received from the author or contributor thereof? (6) Did you, or the editor, or anyone on behalf of the Times at any time make any inquiry as to the antecedents or reliability of the person who supplied the information? If so, state what was learnt about him. (7) State whether you, or the editor, or any person engaged on the Times have at any time received any and what information as to the person who supplied the reports. (8) Have you or any person in your service or under your control possession of the original manuscript from which the matter published on the 25th of August, 1886, was printed? The answer of the defendant to the above interrogatories was as follows:—I object to answer the interrogatories upon the grounds that they are irrelevant and do not relate to any matters in question in this action, and that they are not put bonâ fide for the purposes of this action, and that I am advised and believe that I am not bound to disclose the names of persons who will probably be my witnesses on the trial, and as to the eighth interrogatory, that it inquires as to the contents of a written document.

Denman, J., at chambers, thought the above answer was sufficient, and refused to order the defendant to make a further and better answer. The Divisional Court (Manisty and Stephen, JJ.), upheld his decision.

The plaintiff appealed.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Cagney, for the plaintiff.—The effect of the interrogatories is to ask the defendant what means be took to ascertain the truth of the libel. The plaintiff is entitled to ask what is the character of the man the defendant relied on. If the writer were actuated by malicious motives, an action would lie, even though the libel were a true report of public proceedings: Stevens v. Sampson, 28 W. R. 87, 5 Ex. D. 53. [Lord Esher, M.R.—In that case the action was brought against the writer of the report.] The defendant has adopted the report, and would be affected by malice in the writer. It is not a sufficient excuse for refusing to give persons' names that you intend to call them as witnesses: Marriott v. Chamberlain, 34 W. R. 783, 17 Q. B. D. 154. As to the manuscript of the letter, the plaintiff desires to know what were the materials which the editor had, and whether certain matters were in the manuscript, or were added by the editor.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Graham, for the defendant.—These interrogatories are irrelevant. The defence is that the reports are true and the comments fair. Fair comment is quite a different defence from privilege, and the question of malice does not arise: Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 11 W. R. 569, 3 B. & S. 769; Merivale v. Carson, 36 W. R. 231, 20 Q. B. D. 275. The defendant will have to establish his defence—viz., that the reports are true and the comments fair, and on such issues all question as to malice is irrelevant. Moreover, if malice were shown in the writer, it would be no evidence against the defendant: Clark v. Newsam, 1 Ex. 131; Robertson v. Wylde, 2 Moo. & R. 101. The publication being admitted, the name or character of the writer is not material. Neither is it material what is in the manuscript; for the defendant will have to show that the published account is true.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case interrogatories have been administered and have been answered. But it is said that the answers are unsatisfactory, and we are requested to direct that further answers should be made. To that the objection is taken that any further answers to these interrogatories cannot disclose anything material to enable the party administering either to maintain his own case or to destroy his adversary's case. If the answers would be material for either of these purposes the interrogatories ought to be answered. Now can they be material for either purpose? It was suggested that the interrogatories were put for the purpose of asking the names of persons who had made certain statements to the defendant; it was said that it might be shown that those persons were actuated by malicious motives, and that, if so, the defendant must be held to be malicious, so that any privilege he might have would be taken away. But to show that the persons who gave the information were actuated by malice does not carry the case forward, for that is consistent with absence of malice in the defendant. I think that the names and the motives of the informing persons are immaterial for the purpose of showing malice.

But the real defence set up in this action is that the reports are correct and the comments fair; and on that defence the question of malice does not arise. As to whether the comments are fair or not, how can that depend on the names of the persons who gave the information, or on whether they were malicious or not, or on whether the defendant's conduct with regard to them was fair or not? And on the question whether the reports are a correct account of what happened, it is clear that the names of the persons who sent them are immaterial. The issue is whether what the defendant has stated is in effect true. Suppose the names are given, that can have no effect on that issue. Again, suppose the manuscript produced, that can have no effect on the issue. The jury will have to compare what the defendant has published with what actually took place in the colony; and for that purpose the contents of the manuscript will be immaterial. Suppose the manuscript was produced and was found to differ from the published report, the question would still be whether the published report truly represented what took place. The only object of getting the names of these persons or production of this document is to enable the plaintiff to go to those persons or to look into that document for the purpose of finding out other evidence than the names or the document to show that the description of what took place is not correct or that the comment is unfair. The plaintiff wants to find something, of which he at present knows nothing, to see if he cannot make out a case. That is, the interrogatories are fishing interrogatories. I am of opinion that we ought not to order further answers to be given.

Lindley, L.J.—I think that these interrogatories have been sufficiently answered. My only doubt is as to the eighth interrogatory. It is important to remember that interrogatories in actions for libel are entirely novel. Courts of equity used never to grant discovery in aid of an action of tort. And consequently equity lawyers never had to consider the limitations of the doctrine of discovery with regard to such actions as libel or slander. Therefore, the courts ought to be very careful in dealing with interrogatories in these actions. As to the manuscript, the defendant has made an affidavit of documents, but he has omitted to mention the manuscript, on the ground that it is not material to the issue in the action. But I think that, primâ facie, this manuscript might be material. I am not, however, prepared to carry out this view logically, for it has not been the practice of the courts of law which are familiar with actions of libel to order the production of manuscripts under such circumstances. Therefore I do not dissent from what the Master of the Rolls has said on that matter, and in all the rest I concur.

Lopes, L.J., concurred with the Master of the Rolls.

Mayor, &c., of the Staple of England v. Bank of England. (a.)

Estoppel—Negligence—Custody of seal of corporation—Unauthorized use of seal—Transfer of stock—Proximate cause.

The clerk to a corporation, having sole custody of their corporate seal, affixed it without their authority to a power of attorney, by means of which certain stock, the property of the corporation, was sold by the defendants, and the proceeds were appropriated by the clerk.

Held, on the authority of Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities, 5 H. L. Cas. 389, that, assuming the corporation to have been negligent, they were not disentitled to recover the stock from the defendants, since their negligence was not the proximate cause of the loss.

Appeal from a divisional court (Day and Wills, JJ.).

The plaintiffs were an ancient corporation finally incorporated by a charter in 1669, with perpetual succession and a common seal. The objects for which the corporation was originally created had ceased to exist. Their corporate seal and minute-book were kept by one Drew, who was clerk to the corporation, and he also received, under a power of attorney, and accounted to the treasurer for, the dividends of £4,250 stock, which constituted the whole of their funds. In May, 1884, an application was made to the defendants by a firm of stockbrokers for a power of attorney to two members of the firm for the sale of this stock. The defendants sent a notice of this application directed to the plaintiffs, which was neither acknowledged nor returned. The stock was sold under the power of attorney, and the proceeds received by Drew. The seal of the corporation was affixed to the power of attorney at Drew's house without any authority from the corporation and before two witnesses who were not corporators. Drew appropriated the proceeds of the sale, and was subsequently tried and convicted for the offence. The plaintiffs then brought this action for the £4,250 stock on the ground that it had been transferred without authority. The action was tried before Pollock, B., when the jury found that the plaintiffs had been guilty of negligence so as to have induced the defendants to act on the power of attorney, but the Divisional Court entered judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that the negligence of the plaintiffs was not the proximate cause of the loss.

The defendants appealed.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., H. D. Greene, Q.C., and Arbuthnot, for the appellants.

Finlay, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the respondents.

The following cases were cited:—Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charity, 5 H. L. Cas. 389; Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253; Swan v. North British Australasian Co., 11 W. R. 862, 2 H. & C. 175; Arnold v. Cheque Bank, 24 W. R. 759, 1 C. P. D. 578.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The question we have to determine in this case is whether where the defendants have transferred stock belonging to the plaintiffs to a stranger without their authority, they can protect themselves from liability for so doing. Primâ facie the presumption is that they cannot, but it is urged that the plaintiffs have so acted as to entitle the bank to be excused from liability. The only points, therefore, are whether there was any evidence of negligence, and whether, if so, it was evidence which ought to have been left to the jury. It appears to me unnecessary to decide the first point. Even assuming that there was negligence on the part of the plaintiffs, the case, as far as the facts go, is indistinguishable from the decision in the House of Lords in Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities. We have, therefore, only to consider whether the negligence was such as to exonerate the defendants. The principle which was laid down by Parke, J., in the case I have referred to distinguishes between negligence generally and that species of negligence which would alone warrant the jury in finding that the plaintiffs were not entitled to insist that the transfer was void. "The negligence which would deprive the plaintiff of his right to insist that the transfer was invalid must be negligence in or immediately connected with the transfer itself." The manner in which the learned judge goes on to deal with Young v. Grote, where the drawer had caused a banker to pay a forged cheque by his neglect in the mode of drawing the cheque itself, shows that he meant that the negligence must be proximately connected with the result. That is the decision of the House of Lords, and is binding on all courts, and that was recognized to be the decision in the case of Swan v. North British Australasian Co., where Blackburn, J., says:—"The neglect must be in the transaction itself, and be the proximate cause of leading the party into the mistake."

Assuming, therefore, that there was negligence by the plaintiffs in this case which was calculated to deceive, and did in fact deceive, the bank, nevertheless there was no case to go to the jury because the negligence was not the proximate cause of the bank's transferring the stock.

The plaintiffs' negligence consisted in their implicit trust in Drew, and between that negligence and what the bank did many circumstances existed which prevented that negligence from being the proximate cause of the transfer of the stock by the bank.

I, therefore, think there was no evidence to go to the jury, and that the decision of the Divisional Court was right.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If the question were simply whether the plaintiffs had departed from the reasonable precautions which might be expected from business men as to the custody of their seal, I should not be inclined to differ from the verdict of the jury. But there is a further question. Even assuming that the plaintiffs were careless and incautious, the bank must show, in order to succeed, that their carelessness directly and proximately led to the transfer of the stock. The case of Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities is precisely in point. The language there used by Parke, J., and adopted by the House of Lords is neither difficult nor ambiguous, and it was, as I think, correctly interpreted in Swan v. North British Australasian Co., by Blackburn, J., when he said that the negligence, in order to work an estoppel, must be a proximate negligence.

In this case it seems to me clear that there were no grounds on which the jury could find that the negligence of the plaintiffs directly led to the transfer. Drew was, it appears, a man of position and reputation, and even if it was careless of the plaintiffs to leave their seal in his custody, it cannot be said that it was the immediate consequence of that carelessness that he would commit the forgery he committed, and that the bank would be induced by that to transfer the stock. The proximate cause of the transfer was, in my opinion, the crime committed by Drew, and I cannot think that that crime was the natural, necessary, or direct consequence of the carelessness of the plaintiffs. The case is, I think, covered by authority, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—I agree, and have very few words to add. I am by no means clear that there was any evidence of negligence at all here, but if there was I think it is abundantly clear, on the authority of Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities, that the negligence was not such as to justify the verdict of the jury. It is impossible to distinguish the two cases, and we are bound by the principles there laid down.

Appeal dismissed.

Chan. Div. North, J. — July 25.

White v. City of London Brewery Co. (Limited). (a.)

Mortgage — Public-house — Mortgagees in possession — Lease by mortgagees with clause binding tenant to take beer, &c., from them — Account — Interest — Profit derived from sale of beer to tenant.

A leasehold public-house was mortgaged to brewers who entered into possession, and, after carrying on the business for some time, leased the public-house to tenants, with agreements binding the tenants to take their beer, &c., from them, under which they derived a large profit from the sale of beer, &c. They afterwards sold the public-house under the power of sale in the mortgage.

Held, in an action by the mortgagor for an account, that the mortgagees were not entitled to interest on the cost of beer supplied while they were carrying on the business; that they were not bound to account for the profits derived from the sale of beer, &c., to the tenants of the public-house; but that they were chargeable with the increased rent they might have obtained if the tenants had been under no restrictions as to purchasing their beer.

By an indenture dated the 4th of February, 1868, John White, the holder of a lease for sixty years from the 24th of June, 1861, subject to a rent of £60, of a public-house known as the "Woodstock Arms," Rushing-road, mortgaged his interest in the public-house to the City of London Brewery Co. (Limited) for the sum of £700, with interest at £5 per cent., the mortgage containing a proviso that the total amount to be recovered by the company should not exceed £980.

In September, 1869, the payment of interest being in arrear, the company entered into possession of the public-house, and, having obtained a transfer of the licence, carried on the business of publicans there down to March, 1871, and incurred a loss of £272 12s.

In March, 1871, the company, having furnished the public-house, let it to Moulton at a rent of £15 for the house and £15 for the furniture, the company doing all repairs, and Moulton remained their tenant until 1873, when the company let the public-house, unfurnished, to Hake at a rent of £60, the company doing all repairs, both the tenants being bound by their agreements to purchase their beer from the company.

On the 17th of September, 1879, the company sold the public-house for £2,650, and after deducting the sum of £2,166 8s. 7d. due to them under the mortgage, paid over the balance to R. J. E. Carr, who was second mortgagee of the public-house.

The action was commenced by J. White, the mortgagor, in 1880, against the company and R. J. E. Carr, the second mortgagee, for an account of the proceeds of the sale of the public-house and other moneys received by the company by virtue of their mortgage, and on the 27th of April, 1881, judgment was obtained, by which the following accounts were directed:—

1. An account of what was due to the defendant company under the indenture of mortgage of the 4th of February, 1868.

2. An account of all money laid out by the defendant company in necessary repairs and lasting improvements on the hereditaments comprised in the said mortgage. And it is ordered that interest should be computed on sums which should appear to have been so laid out after the same rate as the mortgage carried.

3. An account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises received by the defendant company, or which, without their wilful default, might have been received.

4. An inquiry what profits were made by the defendant company in carrying on the business since they took possession of the mortgaged premises, and what sums ought to be allowed them for skilled labour and expenses out of pocket in carrying on such business.

The chief clerk, by his certificate, allowed to the company the sum of £50 0s. 2d. for interest on the amount of beer supplied while carrying on the business of the public-house from September, 1869, to March, 1871; and also found that the company had made a profit of £1,991 18s. 9d. by selling beer to the tenants of the public-house who were bound by their agreements to purchase their beer from the company.

This was the further consideration of the action, and a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and A. de B. Terrell, for the plaintiff.—The company, as mortgagees, are bound to account for the profits made by them by the sale of beer to the tenant of the mortgaged premises, under agreements compelling the tenants to take their beer from the company. A mortgagee for possession is accountable for any profits he may make, like a trustee. [They referred to Gubbins v. Creed, 2 Sch. & Lef. 214; Gordon v. Lord, 2 Sumner's Circuit Court Reports (1st Circuit), 16, 155; Warner v. Jacob, 39 W. R. 731, 20 Ch. D. 220; Chaplin v. Young, 33 Beav. 414, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 29.] At any rate, the company would have obtained more rent for the public-house if they had let it to tenants with free agreements, and they ought to be charged with a higher rent than they received.

Higgins, Q.C., and J. D. Fitzgerald, for the defendants.—The company are not bound to account for the profits derived from the sale of beer to the tenants of the public-house, which is a matter quite collateral to the mortgage. [They referred to Fisher on Mortgage, 4th ed., 1454; Brandon v. Brandon, 10 W. R. 22; Hughes v. Williams, 12 Ves. 493; Dunsmuir v. Brighton Club Co., 23 W. R. 795, L. R. 10 Q. B. 371; Robertson v. Norris, 1 Giff. 428, 8 W. R. Ch. D. 43; Dobson v. Land, 8 Hare, 216.] We submit that the evidence shows that the company could not have obtained higher rent from the tenants of the public-house even if they had let it as a free house.

NORTH, J., stated the facts, and proceeded.—No interest is payable on the amount due for beer supplied under or by virtue of the mortgage, which excludes interest on any such sum as that. There may be a claim for such interest under the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, on a sufficient demand being made, but this is a suit to ascertain what is due under and by virtue of the mortgage security. The allowance in respect of that sum ought not to have been made. The company entered into possession of the public-house in September, 1869, put a man in the house, and carried on the business at a considerable loss. They then let it to Moulton for little more than two years, and then to Hake. The fourth inquiry directed by the decree, as to what profits were made by the company in carrying on the business, and what sums ought to be allowed them for skilled labour and expenses out of pocket in carrying on such business, was directed without reference to any question of profits made afterwards, and relates to the time when the company were in possession. The house was unfurnished and the company furnished it and let it to Moulton at a rent of £30, £15 for the house and £15 for the rent of the furniture. There is no complaint now as to that. From the year 1871 the claim is that the company, as mortgagees, should be charged not only with the rent they obtained for the public-house, but also with the profits made by them by supplying the beer. In my opinion it is not so. The mortgagees are not bound to account for any profit derived from a contract or dealing merely collateral, and not arising out of the mortgaged premises.

In the first place this question is one to be determined at the trial of the action, and it is precluded by the judgment at the trial. It is not within the terms of the decree. The fourth inquiry is as to what profits were made by the company during the time that they were in possession of the public-house, and the decree is silent as to profits derived from the sale of beer, and made afterwards. The inquiry respecting the period after 1871 is confined to the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises received by the company, or which, without their wilful default, might have been received. For the purpose of charging the mortgagees, as it was sought to be done, the inquiry should have been different. But if this had been the trial of the action I do not think that any such inquiry ought to have been ordered. The decree is in the common form for an account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises received by the company. The profits made by supplying the beer are not such profits.

But it is said that these are profits made by the company as mortgagees, and that they are not entitled to any such profits. No authority was cited in support of this contention that is in point. The observations of the Lord Chancellor in Gubbins v. Creed, where he says that, as a trustee cannot be permitted to make any benefit out of the trust fund, so neither shall a mortgagee get any advantage out of the mortgage fund beyond the principal and interest, and that, for that reason, a mortgagee in possession is not at liberty to present to a living, because there is nothing in the presentation for which the mortgagee can account to the mortgagor, and where there is a reference to cases in which it has been held that the right of presentation could not be exercised by a mortgagee because it is not of any value and could not come into account, are not in point. Here the profits sought to be charged are profits made by the sale of beer to tenants of the public-house under agreements binding them to purchase their beer from the mortgagees. The case cited from the American reports does not go farther than the English authorities. There is nothing there that applies specially to the present case. The case of Robertson v. Norris is very near to the present, but not an authority, because the point to be decided here was not raised. The question was whether a mortgagee ought to be allowed credit prices for printing a newspaper of which he had entered into possession and was receiving the money produced by it. Supposing that a trustee were to let the trust property, reserving the right of shooting, he would be charged with what he might have obtained by letting the shooting to somebody else, and not with the value of the game he obtained. The observations of the Vice-Chancellor in Dobson v. Land were as follows:—"On the other hand, a trustee can never make a benefit to himself by any dealing with the trust property; but if a second mortgagee should buy in the first mortgage for half its amount, or even obtain an assignment without consideration from the first mortgagee, I can have no doubt he would be entitled to charge the mortgagor with the full amount of the first mortgage in addition to his own, and other cases of a like kind might be put. This destroys the integrity of the proposition contended for by the mortgagee; and I confess I have great difficulty in seeing why a mortgagee should not, as between himself and the mortgagor only, be allowed to make any contract he pleases collateral to and not affecting the mortgaged premises." The Vice-Chancellor would have held that profits derived from the sale of beer were not sums for which the mortgagee was bound to account.

But that does not dispose of the whole case. It was contended, in the alternative, on behalf of the plaintiff, that by reason of the public-house being let by the company with a condition that the tenant should purchase his beer only from the company a smaller rent was obtained than might have been obtained by letting the house "free" as it was called. I think that the plaintiff is right in that contention. The evidence shows without doubt that a lease of a public-house subject to a condition binding the tenant to take his beer from the lessor is less advantageous than a lease under which the tenant can purchase his beer from anyone he likes. The fact that such an obligation is insisted on by lessors of public-houses is strong corroboration of the opinion that such a lease is less valuable. And the case is the same with a short tenancy. The company, being mortgagees, granted a lease subject to a condition in their own favour which was less beneficial to the mortgagor than if that condition had not been imposed. The property was subject to a ground-rent of £60, and the rent ultimately obtained by the company was £80, so the company in reality got nothing by the rent. Notwithstanding this the public-house fetched the sum of £2,650 in 1879. I am satisfied that a free tenancy is more valuable, and would have fetched a higher rent, and that the mortgagees are not charged with as high a rent as they ought to have been charged with during, at any rate, the period when Hake was tenant. During the first part of the time when Moulton was in the house as manager the business was worked at a loss. The public-house was afterwards let to him at a total rent of £30 a year, of which £15 was for the house and £15 for the furniture; and during that period the business was being built up and the house could not at first be let for more than £15 a year. The conclusion I come to is that the rent should have been £30 from August, 1874, down to the sale of the property. Perhaps I ought to have made a slight increase before that time, and not quite so much afterwards, but I think I shall be doing substantial justice by saying that the rent should be £80 a year—that is £20 more than the rent obtained—from August, 1874, to the time of the sale, and allowing nothing for the other part of the time. The mortgagees must have the costs of the action and the summons, to be set off against the allowances made to the mortgagor, without prejudice to any question between the first and second mortgagees, because, although the mortgagor has succeeded to some extent he has failed to a considerable extent, considering the way in which the points have been raised.

In re Onslow.

Plowden v. Gayford. (a.)

Married woman—Separate use—Property comprised in marriage settlement—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 2, 19.

Under a marriage settlement property was vested in trustees upon trust (in the events which had happened) for such persons as the widow (the husband being dead) should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, for her absolutely. The power was not exercised during the widowhood. In 1887 the widow married again.

Held, that, prior to her second marriage, she would have been entitled to have the fund paid to her absolutely; and that the effect of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was to add the incident of separate use to whatever interest she had in the property comprised in the settlement. She and her husband were therefore entitled to have the fund paid to them discharged from the settlement.

By a settlement dated the 7th of June, 1878, made on the occasion of the marriage of Mrs. Plowden with her previous husband, George Stoate, certain stocks and securities were settled upon trust for Mrs. Plowden (by her then name of Onslow) during her life and during the then intended coverture for her separate use without power of anticipation, and upon trust, after the death of the survivor of the intended husband and wife, for the children and issue of the said intended marriage, and if there should be no child of the said marriage upon trust for such person or persons as Mrs. Plowden should, during coverture, by will, and when not under coverture by deed or will, appoint, and in default of appointment, if Mrs. Plowden should survive her then intended husband, then upon trust for her executors, administrators, and assigns.

George Stoate died on the 3rd of April, 1880, and there were no children of the marriage.

Mrs. Plowden did not exercise her power of appointment during her widowhood.

On the 5th of February, 1887, she married her present husband, Col. Frederick Plowden. No settlement was executed upon that marriage.

Mrs. Plowden, being desirous of releasing the power of appointment by will given to her by her marriage settlement, and of having the funds taken out of settlement, the present summons was taken out for the purpose of determining whether that could be done.

[He also referred to the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 19.] She could release her power of appointment under section 52 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882.

Curtis Price, for the respondent.

Stirling, J., stated the facts, and proceeded.—If Mrs. Plowden had come immediately before her second marriage and asked for payment to her of the funds comprised in the settlement she would have been entitled to it. That is shown by the cases of Holloway v. Clarkson and Devall v. Dickens. What then is her position after the marriage? That depends upon the effect of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The sections of that Act which are important to be considered are the 2nd and the 19th. The 19th section provides that "Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect any settlement or agreement for a settlement made or to be made, whether before or after marriage, respecting the property of any married woman." In the case of In re Armstrong, recently decided by the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 772), the words "interfere with or affect any settlement" were interpreted to mean invalidate or render inoperative any settlement, but it was held that the effect of the section was not to take property subject to a marriage settlement entirely out of the Act.

Applying that to the present case, I say that the Act applies so far as to add the incident of separate use to whatever interest Mrs. Plowden has in the property comprised in her settlement. Whatever estate she now has is hers for her separate use, and she may dispose of it accordingly. If Col. Plowdon has any interest, he is sui juris and can dispose of it. I will accordingly make an order that Col. and Mrs. Plowden are entitled to have the fund paid over to them, and that the trustees do pay the same accordingly.

Lee v. Soames. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Sale by bare trustee of legal estate—No power of sale—Ratification—Time not of the essence of the contract—Notice—Rescission—Time—Reasonableness — Non-mutuality — Specific performance.

A., who was trustee of the bare legal estate is contracted, on the 8th of July, to sell it to B. As soon as B. discovered, by the answers to his requisitions, the true state of the title, he, by further requisition, about the middle of August, required that the beneficiaries should sign or ratify the contract. A. at first refused, and proposed that they should merely join in the conveyance; but upon B. insisting on his requisition A. promised, "without prejudice," that it should be done. The original contract was to have been completed on the 4th of August, but time was not made of the essence. On the 11th of October B. wrote that, unless he received the ratification "within the present week," he should "ask to rescind." Four weeks later, not having received it, he wrote, "The contract is now rescinded." A. had obtained all the necessary signatures within a day or two afterwards.

Held, that B. might have rescinded immediately his further requisition (as to the beneficiaries signing the contract) was refected, and that, at any time after that—the rule as to fixing a reasonable time not being applicable, A. not being able to make a good title himself, nor having power to compel a conveyance by those who could — B. might have declined to wait any longer; and, further, that even if that rule had been applicable, the time allowed was, under the circumstances, reasonable.

Trial of action.

This action was brought by a purchaser against his vendor for a declaration that the contract had been validly rescinded, and for the return of the deposit money with interest.

The defendant counter-claimed for specific performance and payment of balance of the purchase-money.

The sale was advertised as to be made by direction of the trustee of the will of Daniel Willshin, deceased, and in the form of contract annexed to the conditions of sale the defendant was named as the vendor.

The plaintiff was declared the purchaser of the property, which is known as Beltring Farm, in Kent.

The auctioneers signed the memorandum in this form:—"As agents for the vendor, Miss Emily Soames, we confirm this contract."

The contract was dated the 8th of July, 1887, the price was £2,610, and the purchase was to be completed on the 4th of August. The title disclosed by the abstract showed no power in the defendant to sell the property. The purchaser thereupon made a requisition asking that the will should be abstracted, to show the vendor's power of sale. The answer was that the persons interested would join in the conveyance. In answer to another requisition it was stated that Miss Soames was only a bare trustee of the legal estate, and it appeared that she was entitled beneficially to one-fourth only of the farm, the other three-fourths belonging respectively to her two brothers and the trustees of her sister's marriage settlement.

The remaining facts sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Warmington, Q.C., and Ribton, for the plaintiff.—If a person sells property without having any power to sell it, the purchaser can either insist on ratification or rescind the contract. We decline to play a game of "heads you win, tails we lose." There must be mutuality—a contract that can be enforced both ways. The authorities we rely on are:—Hoggart v. Cutts, 1 Russ. & My. 293; Forrer v. Nash, 14 W. R. 8, 35 Beav. 167; Brewer v. Broadwood, 31 W. R. 115, 22 Ch. Cuther, Q.C., and Gatey, for the defendant.—The [illegible] beneficial owners, who had been consulted beforehand. Another question is whether the plaintiff gave sufficient time for performance of the contract. There was no substance in the purchaser's objection, because the execution by the beneficiaries of the conveyance would have answered every purpose. Where time is not of the essence of the contract the right of a purchaser to rescind only arises where there has been gross delay or default by the vendor, and then only after giving a reasonable time: Green v. Sevin, 13 Ch. D. 589, 28 W. R. Dig. 172; Here all the beneficiaries were from the first willing to concur. The notice is not to rescind, but that he will seek to rescind: Reynolds v. Nelson, 6 Madd. 18; Salisbury v. Hatcher, 2 Yo. & Coll. 54; Wylson v. Dunn; Hatten v. Russell, ante, p. 317, 38 Ch. D. 334. The plaintiff did not at once decline to go on as soon as he found that Miss Soames had only a fourth of the property.

Warmington, Q.C., in reply.—What the plaintiff said in effect as soon as he discovered the real position of the vendor was, "This contract is off—if you can make another in a reasonable time I will accept it."

Kekewich, J.—This case is one of some difficulty, which is really occasioned by the proper conduct of the solicitors on both sides, neither of whom thought it right to express himself with brusqueness. It is conceded that it was a mistake to advertise this property as to be sold by the devisee of Mr. Willshin, but that is not very material, except as having been the commencement of the difficulty in the case. The plaintiff, having purchased on that footing, finds that the abstract discloses no title whatever in that person. It is not a question of parties concurring in the conveyance—the question is whether the trustee had any power to sell at all, and it turns out that she was not intended to be the vendor, except as having the legal estate. But having that, the purchaser is not in a position to say, you have no title, and I am "off" the bargain. The purchaser assumes that somehow the title will be made out, and that the defect is only an omission from the abstract. He says, you have sold to me as trustee of the will, and there is no power of sale shown.

The blot is hit precisely—that the vendor was a bare trustee of the legal estate with no power of sale. The answer is, "The beneficiaries will concur in the conveyance." Mr. Soames had taken care to assure himself that they would concur, and Miss Soames was really selling on their behalf, not as their agent, for one of them was not present when the matter was discussed. The purchaser then says, "The answer to the third requisition states that the beneficiaries will concur, they must send a written ratification before I can go on." That is a distinct intimation, and says, in effect your sale is naught, unless you can show the consent of the beneficiaries. To that Mr. Soames's answer is somewhat unfortunate, "The vendor cannot undertake to obtain this, the parties referred to will join in the conveyance, and more than this the purchaser cannot require." That was wrong in law, and the purchaser might at once have rescinded on it. That was on the 19th of August, 1887.

In a short time came the purchaser's ultimatum, which was to this effect: "Before I proceed further the beneficiaries must sign a contract," that was perfectly right, "and I shall be obliged if you will get the enclosed document signed by the beneficiaries." If the vendor had assented to that, and carried it out within a reasonable time, there would have been no further trouble. But the purchaser, not getting what he wanted by the 11th of October, then writes: "I shall be glad to receive the ratification signed by the beneficiaries, . . . unless I receive it within the present week I shall seek to rescind the contract, and get return of my deposit." That is not a happy phrase, "seek to rescind," but I think what he meant was, "I shall do what is necessary to rescind." Mr. Soames writes back denying the purchaser's right to rescind, but that "without prejudice" he would endeavour to obtain the ratification. Mr. Lee waited till the 8th of November, but then wrote in effect: "As you have not sent me the ratification of the contract it is now rescinded." On that very day, or within twenty-four hours afterwards, Mr. Soames got it signed. But if the decision come to by the purchaser on the 8th of November was good in law, it is quite immaterial whether the signatures were got within twenty-four hours or any other time. On the 26th of September the purchaser gave fair notice of his position, and again on the 11th of October, and I think that on the 8th of November he was entitled to say, "The contract is at an end." The question raised by Mr. Barber's argument is whether the ordinary rule as to fixing a reasonable time by notice applies, as, if so, it is a question whether a week was sufficient. I think that in this case a week was sufficient, having regard to the previous notices. The rule as stated in Lord St. Leonards' book on Vendors and Purchasers, 13th ed., at p. 227, and referred to and followed by Fry, J., in Green v. Sevin, is as follows: "Where time is not made of the essence of a contract by the contract itself, although a day for performing it is named, of course neither party can strictly make it so after the contract; but if either party is guilty of delay, a distinct written notice by the other that he shall consider the contract at an end if it be not completed within a reasonable time to be named, would be treated in equity as binding on the party to whom it is given." The rule is also stated to the same effect in Fry, L.J.'s 2nd edition of his work on Specific Performance, at p. 471: "Where time was not originally of the essence of the contract, but one party has been guilty of gross, vexatious, unreasonable, or unnecessary delay or default in relation to it, the other party becomes entitled to limit a reasonable time within which the contract shall be perfected by the other." Both those statements of the law, and others in numerous cases where the point has been discussed, assume that there is a contract. But where is the contract in this case between the real vendor and the purchaser? There is nothing but a contract between Miss Soames and the purchaser.

I, therefore, hold that the rule does not apply at all to the present case. In Forrer v. Nash, 35 Beav., at p. 171, Lord Romilly said, "When a person sells property which he is neither able to convey himself, nor has the power to compel a conveyance of it from any other person, the purchaser, as soon as he finds that to be the case, may say, 'I will have nothing to do with it.'" That was upheld again by Fry, J., in Brewer v. Broadwood, 31 W. R., at p. 116, 22 Ch. D., at p. 109. From the first Mr. Lee said he would have nothing to do with the contract, "but if you can get me a proper contract, I don't want to be 'off' my purchase; you have got to prove that there is a contract, you have not done it, and until you do it I decline to go on." I do not think the question of time applies at all to such a case. The defendant says, "Because you have not been so strict in standing on your exact rights as you might have been, you are bound." I think that the plaintiff on the 8th of November said, and was entitled to say, "This contract is at an end." That is quite consistent with the cases cited for the vendor, especially Salisbury v. Hatcher. In this case the purchaser did reject the contract as soon as he had ascertained the real interest of the vendor, and he maintained that position throughout. I must, therefore, give him the relief he asks, and I think practically in the way he asks it. I hold that the contract was rescinded on the 8th of November. The claim asks for a declaration of the validity of the rescission of the contract, and for repayment of the deposit with interest. Anything more comes by way of damages. The case of Bain v. Fothergill, 23 W. R. 261, L. R. 7 H. L. 158, lays down exactly how the damages are to be arrived at. The counter-claim must be dismissed, with costs.

TUDBALL v. MEDLICOTT. (a.)

Will—Construction—Devise to trustees, their "heirs and assigns"—Mixed gift of freeholds and chattels—Attraction—Trust for tenant for life subject to condition to repair and insure—Receipt clause—Estate of trustees—Trust property sold under deed alleged to be forged—Duty and liability of trustees as to recovering the property—Indemnity against costs.

A condition in a gift to a tenant for life that the premises are to be kept in repair and insured does not indicate an intention to give the trustees the legal estate (for the purpose of enabling them to enforce the condition) if they would not take it otherwise, as the condition can be enforced against the tenant for life by the remainderman without the intervention of the trustees.

The rule that trustees take only so much of the legal estate as is sufficient to enable them to perform the duties imposed on them does not apply where the gifts of the life interest and the remainder are made without any change of words, as where there is a devise to trustees, their heirs and assigns, "in trust for A. for life," and, after his death, "in trust for his children."

A testator gave and devised a freehold property and flour-mill, together with the millstones, &c., grates, and other fixtures "now thereon or therein," to trustees, their heirs and assigns, upon trust for A. for life, but subject to a condition to keep the premises, fixtures, &c., in repair, and insure the buildings in the names of the trustees; and from and after A.'s decease in trust for his children. Mortgage and trust estates were devised "unto and to the use of" the trustees, their heirs and assigns. There was a declaration that the receipt of the trustees should be a sufficient discharge, and a power to appoint new trustees, with a direction that the estate should, upon any such appointment, be "vested" in the new and continuing trustees "upon and for the trusts and purposes aforesaid."

Held, that the trustees took no estate in the freehold mill, &c., so given and devised.

Trustees are not bound at their own expense to take proceedings for the recovery of trust property not lost by their own default.

A person claiming to be transferee of a mortgage of trust property gave notice of the mortgage to the trustees, who were convinced that the deed was a forgery. The property was afterwards sold under the power of sale in the mortgage at an auction, of which the trustees also had notice, but they took no steps, and accepted the balance of the purchase-money remaining after the claim under the mortgage had been satisfied, and acknowledged the receipt in their accounts.

Held, that the trustees were justified in declining to take any proceedings at their own risk and without an indemnity from their cestui que trusts, and that they had done nothing for which they could be held liable to make good the loss of the property, even if it were proved that it had been lost, which was not proved.

Trial of action.

This action was brought by Adelaide Ethel Mary Tudball, the infant daughter of A. J. Tudball (by her next friend) against the Rev. Samuel Medlicott and Thomas Ponsford, as the trustees of the will of her father's great uncle, the late Amos Tudball, of Vis House, Roadwater, Somerset.

The said testator, by his will dated the 4th of June, 1870, gave and devised to the defendants, their heirs and assigns, his freehold messuage, with the flour-mills, dwelling-houses, closes of land, &c., called the mill tenement, and also three several closes of land, parcels of Cape's tenement, respectively situate near Roadwater, together with the millstones, mill machinery, threshing-machine, chaff-cutter, malt-mill, apple-mill, grates, and other fixtures then thereon or therein, upon trust for his great nephew A. J. Tudball (in the will called "Amos Tudball") for his life, but upon the express condition that the said premises respectively should be kept in good tenantable repair, and the buildings thereon insured against fire in a competent sum in the names of his said trustees, and also that the said machinery and fixtures should be kept in good repair, and renewed from time to time as occasion should require, and from and after the decease of the said A. J. Tudball in trust for all and every the children and child of the said A. J. Tudball who, being a son or sons, should respectively attain twenty-one, or, being a daughter or daughters, should respectively attain that age or marry, in such shares and proportions, or wholly in favour of any one such child, as the said A. J. Tudball should by deed or will appoint, or in case there should be no such child, then in trust for the testator's own right heirs for ever. The leaseholds and personalty were left to A. J. Tudball subject to payment of debts and legacies.

The trust and mortgage estates were devised "unto and to the use of" the two trustees, their heirs and assigns, subject to the trusts and equities affecting the same.

The will contained also a power to appoint a new trustee or new trustees, with a direction that the trust estate was, upon such appointment, to be transferred and vested in the new and continuing trustees "upon and for the trusts and purposes aforesaid." A. J. Tudball and the defendants were appointed executors. The testator died on the 20th of April, 1871, and his will was proved by the three executors. Upon the testator's death A. J. Tudball took possession of the property, but in 1876 he set out for Australia, being then in difficulties, and was soon afterwards made a bankrupt. The same year a Mr. Cook brought Mr. Ponsford a document purporting to be a mortgage to secure £1,100, executed by the testator on the 30th of August, 1870, less than three months after the date of the will. Mr. Cook himself was a transferee of the mortgage. Mr. Ponsford had no doubt that the document was a forgery by A. J. Tudball, and expressed himself to that effect both orally and by letter.

The property was subsequently sold by auction for £1,250, and, after the transferee's claims had been satisfied, the surplus, amounting to £69 9s. 10d., was received by the trustees, and the receipt acknowledged in the residuary accounts. A. J. Tudball underwent a term of penal servitude in Australia for a forgery committed there, and Mr. Ponsford's attention was called to the importance of getting evidence from him before he was released. He and his co-trustee, however, declined to take any proceedings without an indemnity.

The plaintiff, who was now in her seventeenth year, was the only surviving child of A. J. Tudball and his wife, who were both living, and she claimed to have the defendants ordered, at their own expense, to take all necessary and proper proceedings for establishing her title to, and recovering possession of, the property, and in default, to have them declared jointly and severally liable to make good the value of it.

Warmington, Q.C., and Hastie, for the plaintiff.—The mortgage of August, 1870, was a forgery by A. J. Tudball. But our case does not rest on that, as the admitted fact that Ponsford had no doubt that it was a forgery is sufficient for our purpose. Though fully convinced as to the forgery, he stood by and allowed the transferee to sell the property at an auction, of which he had had notice. He and his co-trustee approved the title of the transferee by accepting the balance of the proceeds of sale and acknowledging the receipt in their accounts; and they took no steps to recover the trust property or assert their title. The legal estate was in the trustees: Collier v. Walters, 22 W. R. 209, L. R. 17 Eq. 252; Doe v. Willan, 2 Barn. & Ald. 84. Subject to no violence being done to the words of the will, the court is astute to give the trustees the legal estate where necessary to protect the children's interests. Here the trustees had something to do—viz., to see that the condition to repair and insure was observed: Houston v. Hughes, 6 Barn. & Cress. 405. [Kekewich, J., referred to Cunliffe v. Brancker, 3 Ch. D. 393, 25 W. R. Dig. 338.] In that case it was necessary, in order to give effect to the limitations of the will, to hold that the trustees did not take the legal estate in fee. Chattels were here included with the freeholds in the gift to the trustees, which is a further reason for holding that they took the legal estate. [They also referred to Baker v. White, 23 W. R. 670, L. R. 20 Eq. 166, and Marshall v. Gingell, 31 W. R. 63, 21 Ch. D. 790.] Besides, the trustees are not in the position of having done nothing. They went to the court for directions as trustees. They put themselves in the position of trustees. They gave a receipt to the transferee of the forged mortgage. They are, therefore, estopped from saying that they have no estate.

Neville, Q.C., and Chubb, for the defendant Medlicott.—Trustees take the legal estate only so far as is necessary to enable them to perform their duties: Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., vol. 2, pp. 290, 291; Doe v. Nicholls, 1 Barn. & Cress. 336. As to the chattels given with the freeholds, see Baker v. White. Besides, these chattels were fixtures, and are so treated by the testator; and those claiming under the will cannot be heard to say they are not. [Kekewich, J.—How can the trustees see that the condition to repair and insure is observed if they have not the legal estate?] The remainderman can enforce the condition: Woodhouse v. Walker, 28 W. R. 765, 5 Q. B. D. 404; In re Williamson, 54 L. T. N. S. 105. Besides, trustees can have powers without any estate. (1) This is not a duty imposed on the trustees at all. (2) They can perform it without having the legal estate. The testator gives trust and mortgage estates "unto and to the use of" the trustees. The condition to repair and insure being only during the tenancy for life, the trustees at most only take the legal estate for the life. [They also referred on this point to Cunliffe v. Brancker; Richardson v. Harrison, 38 Q. B. D. 85, 34 W. R. Dig. 224; and Marshall v. Gingell.] Then, if we had no legal estate, we could not maintain ejectment. If we took it for the life of the tenant for life, no right of action on behalf of the remainderman arises in anyone till the death of the tenant for life. We could not recover on behalf of the man who forged the deed, he being estopped. It is for the plaintiff to show that we had the means to bring an action. If the estate can be recovered, there is no loss; if it cannot, cadet quæstio. Mr. Medlicott's position was perfectly correct. He said, "If you will indemnify me, I will sue; if not, I won't."

H. Hall, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the defendant Ponsford.—There is no duty in a dry trustee except to convey to the person beneficially entitled. He cannot be bound to bring an action at his own risk as to costs. The beneficiaries ought to ask permission to use his name: Annesley v. Simeon, 4 Madd. 390; Fletcher v. Fletcher, 4 Hare, 67. Even where a trustee is the proper person to sue he is not bound to do so without an indemnity. Mr. Ponsford actually signed an authority to the beneficiaries to use his name, though the other trustee refused. The estate is still there; it is not lost; the tenant for life is still alive.

Warmington in reply.—The insurance was to be in the names of the trustees. In the clause giving power to appoint new trustees the estate is directed to be transferred and vested in the new trustees, which shows there must be something to vest. Richardson v. Harrison is in my favour. No excuse or justification has been offered for these trustees, after notice and full warning of the circumstances, having admitted the title of a stranger. It is treason to their trust. Where a trustee is asked to undo the harm he has done he is not entitled to an indemnity.

Kekewich, J.—This case has raised questions of novelty and difficulty and of considerable interest to anyone who has made a study of the law; and it raises a question of vast importance to trustees—a large body of men who are sometimes disposed to think themselves hardly treated. The question I have to decide is whether the defendants, Mr. Medlicott and Mr. Ponsford, are responsible by reason of this property not being now available for the purposes of the will. The first point I have to consider, and, as far as possible, independently of the facts, is the construction of the will, which is obviously drawn by a lawyer. It seems the testator had some real property—not very much—and also, in connection with it, some chattels, which he describes as fixtures, and that he carried on business as a farmer or miller. He had also some leasehold property, some cottages, and some personal estate, and he made his will with reference to all these different kinds of property. He was minded to enrich, so far as he could, his great-nephew, A. J. Tudball, whom he describes as Amos Tudball. His general notion was to make him tenant for life of the real estate and give him all the personal estate, subject to a few legacies. That being so, he made his will in a form that has given rise to considerable discussion, and I have to decide whether, by that will, he gave the legal estate in the real property to the defendants, the two trustees, whom he also appointed executors in conjunction with his great-nephew.

It is not necessary to refer to any of the cases on the question of construction, for though the rules laid down by those cases cannot, even in 1888, be disregarded, the tendency of the court of late has been to hold that the real question is what was the testator's intention, which is to be gathered from the language employed, and that the language is to be looked at from the testator's point of view. Accordingly I approach this will with a desire to find out, as far as I can, this testator's intention. He gives his whole real estate, "together with the millstones, mill machinery, threshing-machine, chaff-cutter, malt-mill, apple-mill, grates, and other fixtures now thereon or therein," to his friends, Samuel Medlicott and Thomas Ponsford, their heirs and assigns, and I am asked to hold that the fact of these chattels or fixtures being added shows that he meant to give the legal estate to the persons whom I call the trustees, to whom he has given it in words. He gives the property with the words of limitation "their heirs and assigns," but, considering the date of the will, that is immaterial. To my mind the addition of those chattels or fixtures does not imply any other gift than could be gathered from the gift of the real estate by itself. They were all things which might fairly be understood to be attached to the real estate devised, and the testator himself classifies them as fixtures by the words "and other fixtures" which follow. Then he goes on "upon trust for my great-nephew, Amos Tudball, for life"—if he stopped there, there is no doubt that Amos Tudball would take the legal estate and the trustees nothing, but he goes on "upon the express condition that the said premises respectively shall be kept in good tenantable repair, and the buildings insured against fire, in the names of my said trustees," "and the machinery and fixtures kept in good order and repair, and renewed from time to time."

This condition was much relied on as showing an intention to vest the legal estate in the trustees so as to enable them to enforce it. One answer that was given to that was that it might imply a power which would enable them to discharge the duty. I cannot see any way to imply that, but, on the other hand, I do not consider that that clause can be read as showing any intention to give the trustees anything that is not otherwise given to them. There is no reason, according to the cases, why that should not be a good condition enforceable as against the tenant for life by those entitled in remainder, and I can see no reason why the intervention of the trustees should be required in order to enforce it. It is true the insurance was to be in the names of the trustees, and Mr. Warmington relied upon that in connection with the fixtures. But it was only the buildings that were to be insured, the fixtures were not to be insured in the names of the trustees, or at all.

He goes on, "and from and after the decease of Amos Tudball in trust for all and every the children and child of the said Amos Tudball." Observe, there is no change of phrase between the gift to Amos Tudball and the gift to Amos Tudball's children. So if I held the legal estate was in the trustees for the life of Amos Tudball, I must also hold that they had it during the children's interest—that is to say, that they had it in fee. Of course there is the rule of construction that only a quantum of the legal estate, sufficient to perform the duties imposed, will be held to be given, but it would be straining that rule to apply it where there is no change of words, and where the legal estate must depend only on the first words of the gift. Then he gives all his personal estate to his nephew. Then there is a gift, "unto and to the use of" Mr. Medlicott and Mr. Ponsford, of mortgage and trust estates. That is a small point, but a fair one; that where he is bound to pass the legal estate he uses the words "unto and to the use of," which undoubtedly pass it. That is followed by a declaration that the receipt of the trustees shall be a sufficient discharge, which is adapted to the duties of the devisees of trust and mortgage estates. Then there is a power for the appointment of new trustees, which is capable of application to the legal estate in the property devised by the will, if such estate passed by the devise, but will also answer to the other property given to the trustees. But then it is said that when the new trustees are appointed the estate is to be vested in them "upon and for the trusts and purposes aforesaid," and that the last words do not exactly hit the case of the trust and mortgage estates. That is a small point, but as far as it goes it is in favour of the legal estate vesting in the trustees. I do not think it is sufficient to counterbalance the intention of the testator as gathered from the whole will. The conclusion I have arrived at is that the legal estate is not vested by this will in the trustees at all, not even during the life of the nephew. And if the trustees have no legal estate they certainly could not recover this property, and if they did attempt it there would be a complete answer to them. But though this decision makes it unnecessary to decide the great question in this case, I think it would be wholly unsatisfactory to deal with the case in that way, and that I should be shirking my duty, which I have no desire to do. I therefore propose to decide the greater question whether, assuming that the trustees had some such estate, as is alleged, either the whole or a part, they did discharge their duty to their cestui que trust, or whether they ought to have taken proceedings to recover this property. That depends, in a great measure, on a particular deed—the mortgage of the 30th of August, 1870.

The will was made on the 4th of June, 1870, and it devised the estate in the manner we have seen. The mortgage, dated the 30th of August of the same year, is produced to Mr. Ponsford, one of the two trustees, after the testator's death. It would be strange that a man who executed that will should have executed such a mortgage so shortly after the date of his will. Mr. Ponsford might very well be astonished. He at once suggested that it was a forgery, and I was asked to say that it was a forgery. The plaintiff was not content to rest on Mr. Ponsford's admission that he had no doubt it was a forgery, or on Mr. Medlicott's assertion that he knew no more than Mr. Ponsford; but he endeavoured to prove that it was a forgery to my satisfaction. However, I declined to decide that question. Nothing could have been more improper than for me to have expressed a judicial opinion in the absence of A. J. Tudball—whose forgery it almost must have been if it was a forgery at all—that he had been guilty of a felony. If it was a forgery, the mortgagee who advanced money on the security of the deed took no estate whatever and had no security, and the purchaser has no estate whatever. It would therefore be entirely wrong for me to hold that it was a forgery in their absence and without their having an opportunity of sifting and contradicting the evidence. Perhaps it was in consequence of my declining to decide that question that the evidence given on it was so thin. It would surprise me extremely to hear that a man had been convicted and another ejected on such evidence. For my purpose I may take it as admitted by Mr. Ponsford that he did not think the testator had executed the mortgage, and that Mr. Medlicott is contented to "run with him." Mr. Ponsford certainly knew about the matter very shortly after the testator's death, though Mr. Medlicott did not know as soon. Yet Mr. Ponsford did nothing. He knew where A. J. Tudball was from time to time. His attention was called from time to time to the difficulty of the infant remainderman's position with reference to this property. He seems to have acted the part of the kind friend. He could not act as solicitor himself, having retired from practice, but he introduced Mrs. Tudball to another gentlemen, who took up the matter energetically, and seems to have done his best. Beyond that Mr. Ponsford did nothing. I am not sure that he and Mr. Medlicott were not a little careless as trustees; perhaps they did not trouble themselves quite so much as the friends of a man who was gone might have been expected to do. But they had an extremely difficult office—they had no money in hand, and no sufficient evidence of the forgery to establish a case against the gentleman who had advanced money on the security of the estate. They would have had to succeed on the strength of their own title, not on the weakness of his. Supposing they were a little wanting in energetic carefulness, and even supposing that they received the £60 odd as the balance of the purchase-money when the property was sold, and thereby approved or adopted, as it is said, the ownership of the trust estate by a stranger, those are only observations on their conduct, and do not go to the root of the matter.

The real question is, Were these trustees bound to commence an action—assuming they had the legal estate in fee vested in them? If they had only the legal estate for the life of A. J. Tudball they could not have done it, because the property would have belonged to A. J. Tudball, whose trustees they were. There was some little property outside this estate, but it was only worth a small sum, and an action must have involved considerable expense as well as trouble. Mr. Warmington put the case against the trustees as strongly as it could be put—"Ought they not to have had this property in hand?" I think trustees have no right to be content with information that their property has been mortgaged, or given away, or lost; they are bound to see where it is. But suppose that, on further inquiry, they find that a title is set up in someone else, are they bound to commence proceedings at their own expense? If they do not, can you fix them with the loss, or punish them for not having done their duty, without being satisfied that if they had done it they would have succeeded in recovering the estate? I know of no rule, and I am satisfied there is no case, which establishes that a trustee is bound to bring an action to recover trust property at his own expense. I can quite understand that if they have let the estate go by their default they should bear the costs of an action to recover it. But that is not the case made here, which is that they ought to have done it long ago when they had no funds, but must have done it, if at all, at their own expense. Besides, how can I make the trustees liable for the loss when I am not satisfied that the property is lost? I am not satisfied that the deed was a forgery. It might be very difficult to get a verdict from a jury that it was so. It may be that the estate will be recovered, and that the remainderman will lose nothing. Why should I say that the trustees, who will in that event have caused no loss, should pay the expense? What ought to have been done? No doubt they might, and I am disposed to think they ought to have come to the court for directions, which it would certainly have given, and thus have saved this litigation. But I am not prepared to hold that trustees, directly a difficulty arises as to their property, are bound to take proceedings and risk getting their costs out of the estate, which may be nothing. They might fairly say they were not paid and that they would not do anything. Be that as it may, I cannot blame them on that account. I think that this is an attempt to establish a new rule, and to make trustees liable beyond their previous liability. I will not be the first judge to establish such a rule. I think that the case fails, and that the trustees, who come here to contest their liability, are entitled to their costs, which must be paid by the next friend.

Municipal election—Signatures of burgesses to nomination paper—Sufficient description—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 241, schedule 3, part 2, rr. 2, 5, and Form T., schedule 7.

The ordinary signatures of burgesses, together with their number on the burgess roll, as proposers on the nomination paper of a candidate at a municipal election are sufficient, provided they can be commonly understood to refer to the corresponding names on the burgess roll.

Special case stated by petitioners in the matter of a municipal election.

The short point in this petition was whether three proposers of a candidate at a ward election in Exeter had been sufficiently described on the nomination paper within the requirements of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), schedule 3, part 2, r. 2.

A candidate, one Tuckwell, had been duly nominated in writing. Among his proposers were three names, as follows, with their numbers on the burgess roll duly filled in—viz.: "Edwin J. Hooper (No. —)," in lieu of "Edwin John Hooper," as on the burgess roll; "W. E. Waller (No. —)," in lieu of "William E—— Waller" on burgess roll; and "R. Turner (No. —)," in lieu of "Robert Turner," on the same roll. The mayor held that the nomination paper had not been sufficiently subscribed by the said three proposers within the requirements of the Act.

Asquith, for the petitioners.—The candidate only is required by rule 5 of schedule 3, part 2, to have his surname and other names stated in the nomination paper. By Form T. space is only given for the signatures of the proposers, and they are sufficiently identified by their number corresponding with that on the roll.

Alderson Foote, for the Mayor of Exeter, was called upon by the court.—The proposers are required to subscribe the nomination paper, not merely to sign it, and they must subscribe their names as on the burgess roll so as to insure identification. The mayor cannot receive evidence of identity if any objection is taken. The only question for him to decide is whether the subscriptions sufficiently identify the proposers with the parties on the burgess roll. These, he held, did not; they could not be cured by further evidence or alteration: Moorhouse v. Linney, 33 W. R. 704, 15 Q. B. D. 273; Gothard v. Clarke, 5 C. P. D. 253, 28 W. R. Dig. 84; Mather v. Brown, 24 W. R. 756, 1 C. P. D. 596; Parliamentary Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 15 (3). Section 241 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, only gives relief to misnomers on the roll.

Manisty, J.—The question for us is whether the Mayor of Exeter was right in holding that this nomination paper was invalid by reason of these particular signatures. We have come to the conclusion that he was not right. By the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 241, "No misnomer or inaccurate description of any person . . . in any roll, list, notice, or voting paper required by this Act shall hinder the full operation of this Act with respect to that person, . . . provided the description of that person . . . be such as to be commonly understood." There is no such specific enactment in regard to the burgesses who nominate the candidate as there is in regard to the candidate, requiring "his surname and other names" to be stated in writing (rule 5 of schedule 3, part 2). Therefore the names of the proposers must be such as, looking to the burgess roll, may be "commonly understood."

It is said that it is excessively important for all authorized objectors to see distinctly whether the proposers of a candidate are the same persons as those on the roll. That is so; but there must be some reasonable doubt shown as to the identity of the proposer with the name on the roll. Can anyone doubt that "Edwin J. Hooper," with the number on the roll following it, is not the same man as "Edwin John Hooper," at the identical number on the roll? But the Form T. given in schedule 8 for a nomination paper seems to me clearly to contemplate the mere signatures of the proposers. Two spaces are left for "the surname" and "other names" of the candidate, the surname coming first; while for the proposers one space only is left, with "A. B.," "C. D.," as specimen signatures. Those signatures are evidently meant to be such as will be "commonly understood" as applicable to the correspending names on the roll. I think these signatures were not so insufficient as to invalidate the nomination paper, and the petition must be granted.

Smirnur, J.—I am of the same opinion. Looking at Form C., though only one space is given, the surname and other names of each burgess as an elector are specifically put in full; again, in Form E., specimen names are given in full for elective auditors; but under Form T., for burgesses nominating a candidate, the heading given is "signature" and then "A. B.," "C. D.," simply. Such a form seems to me clearly to contemplate an ordinary signature sufficient to identify the signature with the name on the roll. That, in a general way, is the ground of my judgment, and I do not think section 241 need be referred to at all for this decision. I was for some time impressed by Mr. Foote's ingenious argument founded on Moorhouse v. Linney—namely, that the signature, being once defective, could not be cured by subsequent evidence—but the whole case there really turns upon the error of the description on the burgess-roll. The correct signature on the nomination paper could not, it was held, repair the error on the roll, and thus the party signing could not identify himself with the name on the roll because that name did not identify him. The case of a cheque made out to one's self in a form different to one's ordinary signature is analogous. One's ordinary signature would not be held sufficient by the bankers to identify one's self with the party named in the cheque, though I have often wondered whether one could legally insist upon their cashing the cheque on proof of the identity of the party, signing his ordinary signature, with the party otherwise described in the cheque. However, that is clearly all the effect of Moorhouse v. Linney in regard to a person wrongly described on the burgess-roll—viz., that his correct signature, during another event under the Act, will not be sufficient to cure the error on the roll. That does not apply here, and the parties attesting were clearly sufficiently described under the statutory forms given by the Act.

Petition granted.

Clark v. Somersetshire Drainage Commissioners. (a.)

Watercourse—Right to pollute—Prescription—Change in manufacture—Land Drainage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 133)—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71).

The appellants began business on certain premises as fellmongers in 1832, and in 1852 added the business of a tannery, discharging the refuse into a stream within the jurisdiction of the respondents. In 1877 the appellants set up a manufactory of leathern boards on the same premises, and discharged refuse of a different character through the old and also through additional outlets into the same stream. The respondents convicted and fined the appellants for pollution of the stream under powers conferred by a local Act, which followed the terms of section 58 of the Land Drainage Act in saving existing legal rights. The quarter sessions upheld the conviction.

Held, that the rights of the appellants must be determined at the time of the passing of the Land Drainage Act, 1861; that, if they had gained at that time any legal right by prescription (as to which, quære), it was only the right to discharge the refuse of the fellmongery business; that that right was now being exercised, whether or not the burden on the servient tenement had been increased; and that the conviction was right.

Special case.

This was an appeal against an order made by the Somersetshire Drainage Commissioners on the 9th of March, 1887, whereby it was adjudged that the appellants, being owners and occupiers of a certain factory called the Bowling Green Factory, situate at Street, in the county of Somerset, did, on certain days in the said order mentioned—to wit, on the 10th of February and the 5th of March and the 24th of August, 1886—cause or permit certain foul or unwholesome washings of manufactories to flow from their said factory into a certain statutory drain or watercourse called the South Drain, being an arterial drainage work within the jurisdiction of the respondents, and whereby the appellants were ordered to pay to the clerk of the respondents the sum of one shilling for each of their said offences. The appellants appeared in person before the respondents and claimed a prescriptive right to cause such washings to flow from their said factory, but the respondents found that no such right had been proved. The appellants appealed against the said order, and the appeal was tried at the Midsummer Quarter Sessions for the county of Somerset, when the said order was confirmed, subject to the following case stated for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division.

1. The said order purported to be made under the powers contained in the Somersetshire Drainage Act, 1877, and especially under the 134th section thereof [which is similar to the 53th section of the Land Drainage Act, 1861], which is in the following words:—"No person shall cause any filthy or unwholesome water or washings of manufactories or mines or other foul or poisonous liquid to flow into any watercourse within the jurisdiction of the commissioners or their board, and any person offending against this enactment shall incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and a further penalty of forty shillings for every day during which the offence is continued, but this section shall not apply to any person having a legal right to cause such water, washing, or liquid aforesaid to flow into any existing river, stream, or watercourse."

2. The watercourse called South Drain is within the jurisdiction of the respondents, and was formed between 1801 and 1806 by the Brue Commissioners under the powers of their special Act dated the 20th of June, 1801, a copy whereof is made part of this case. By virtue of section 42 of the last-mentioned Act, and of section 31 of the Somersetshire Drainage Act, 1877, all the rights, powers, privileges, duties, and liabilities of the said Brue Commissioners and of the Commissioners of Sewers for the County of Somerset or any commissioners appointed under the first part of the Land Drainage Act, 1861, or by virtue of any Act or Acts for the exchange, inclosure, and improvement of lands devolved upon the respondents.

3. The respondents proved that the appellants were the owners and occupiers of the Avalne leather board factory, and that on certain days in the said order mentioned they had discharged into the said watercourse called South Drain certain washings of their said factory from the dyes used by them to colour the leather boards they manufactured, and we held that such washings so discharged amounted to filthy and unwholesome water and washings of their manufactories within the meaning of section 134 of the Somersetshire Drainage Act, 1877.

4. We, therefore, held that the appellants had committed an offence against the 134th section of the said Somersetshire Drainage Act, 1877, and were rightly convicted, unless they could prove that at the time of discharging the said washings from their factory into the South Drain watercourse they had a legal right to cause said washings or liquid to flow into it.

5. The appellants then proved the following facts:—(1) In the year 1832 they came into possession of, and commenced at the said factory, which was then known as the Bowling Green Factory, the business of fellmongers and manufacturers of sheep-skin rugs, which they carried on down to the year 1852, the sheep-skins for the most part being dyed and dressed at other premises, but being washed and scoured, both before and after dyeing, and in some cases also being dyed, at the said Bowling Green Factory, and during this period the refuse and off-scourings of the sheep-skin factory and fellmongers'-yard, of a very filthy character, were discharged into the South Drain, together with the washings of the dyes. (2) In 1852 the business of tanners was added to the other business so carried on as aforesaid, and the premises were enlarged by the construction of three tan-pits, and, in addition to the before-mentioned off-scourings and washings, they discharged therein the refuse, the washings, and spent liquors of the tan-yard and fellmongers'-yard. (3) In 1872 the appellants moved both premises to Northover, taking their workmen with them, and soon after let the premises to another fellmonger named W. Squire, for a term of seven years; Squire, however, failed to carry on that business, and during a part of his tenancy the appellants, with his consent, again made use of the premises during alterations at their new works, but for a short time, and as a temporary measure only. (4) Squire's lease having been cancelled by arrangement in 1877, the appellants altered, and partly rebuilt, their said factory, in order to begin the manufacture of leather boards, and the rateable value of the factory and new machinery was increased in 1878 from £13 10s. to £30, and in 1882 to £90; in 1878 they began the manufacture of leather boards, and procured from America a manager and new machinery, no such factory having hitherto existed in England. (5) The washings from such new factory, which were different in character from those previously discharged, were, from 1878 to the commencement of these proceedings, allowed to flow into the said watercourse in consequence, as well of the alterations made in 1877 and in 1878, as of new precipitating tanks made in 1882; some new and additional outlets were made into the said watercourse, but such outlets were close to the old ones and within the part of the premises abutting on the said watercourse; no refuse of fellmongery or tannery, however, was poured into the said watercourse, but only the washings from the dyes used by the appellants to colour the leather boards; it was of these washings from the factory that complaints were made which led the respondents to take proceedings.

6. Such washings it was proved were not so foul in degree as the dyes and washings from the said factory prior to 1878.

7. At the close of the appellants' case, counsel for the respondents submitted that there was no evidence before the court on which we could find that the appellants had any legal right to pour into the stream the washings and liquids in respect of which the fine had been imposed.

8. The appellants' counsel contended that they had proved a legal prescriptive right to cause such washings to flow into the South Drain watercourse, and that the order appealed against should be quashed.

The quarter sessions confirmed the order of the commissioners.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the appellants, as representing the leather board factory, had, on the days mentioned in the said order, or on either of those days, any legal right to cause such water, washing, or liquid, as aforesaid, to flow from their premises into the said drain or watercourse.

Channell, Q.C., and Austen, for the appellants.—The appellants enjoyed the right to foul the water to the same extent as they are now doing for twenty years before the Act of 1861, and continuously from then up to the present proceedings. The case is within the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71): Rolle v. Whyte, 16 W. R. 593, L. R. 3 Q. B. 286; Leconfield v. Lonsdale, 18 W. R. 1165, L. R. 5 C. P. 657. In the next place no additional burden has been cast on the servient tenements by change in the process of manufacture; mere change of process does not destroy such a right: Bawendale v. McMurray, 16 W. R. 32, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 790; Harvey v. Walters, L. R. 8 C. P. 162, 21 W. R. Dig. 96. [Field, J.—State what the grant you claim is, as was done in Moore v. Webb, 1 C. B. N. S. 673, 5 W. R. Dig. 221; Wright v. Williams, 1 M. & W. 77; Murgatroyd v. Robinson, 5 W. R. 375, 7 El. & Bl. 391.] The plea would be that the defendants had enjoyed the right of pouring out animal, vegetable, organic, and metallic substances, being the washings and refuse from such a factory for such a time.

Blake Odgers and Leonard were not called upon.

Field, J.—It seems to me that there is no need to call on the counsel for the other side to reply in this case. The intention of the Legislature in passing this general drainage Act was to purify the streams of the county and to prevent the acquisition by anybody of any further right of pollution. The appellants say that they had already acquired a right to pollute this stream. The question is whether they had the right in 1861, when the Legislature determined the rights of all persons in this connection, to pour this foul liquid in the same quantity and by the same means as they are now pouring into the stream. If that were so they are not liable to any penalty. The liquid in question is refuse from the manufacture of leathern boards, described by the justices as a foul and filthy liquid. They justify their action by reason of an alleged user for twenty years before the 4th of August, 1861. But I do not think that the periods of twenty and forty years mentioned in the Prescription Act of Will. 4, which are periods to be measured up to the time before action brought, apply to a case like this, and I think Mr. Channell would have had some difficulty in proving that they do so apply. There is no immemorial prescription here, because the finding is that, at one time, no business was carried on in the place. The appellants got possession in 1832, and carried on the business of fellmongers up to 1852, during which period they discharged into the stream the refuse of their washings and dyes. In 1852 the business of a tannery was also carried on for nine years. In 1861 the easement which the defendants are said to have been in a position to claim was that for twenty years before the commencement of the Act they had carried on the business of fellmongers and manufacturers of sheep-skin rugs, and poured out the washings and scourings properly used for carrying on such a business into this stream. That would seem to be the proper form of the plea to be set up. The justices have found that, by their action in 1872 and 1877, the defendants did not abandon any prior right which they may have had. In 1878 the present business was established. The defendants now seek to justify their proceedings by referring to their old user of the stream prior to 1861, and rely on Bawendale's case. They say that they are entitled to set up any business and pour any refuse into this stream so long as they do not cause any further damage to the servient tenements than that which they had to endure at the time of the passing of the general drainage Act. But all the pleading forms which have been used hitherto are framed on the principle that the person claiming such an easement has, either as occupier or freeholder carried on a certain business and acquired a certain right. It is not a principle known to the law that a claim can be maintained to the carrying on of any business of any kind so long as no further damage accrues to the servient tenements. The justices were right.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The line is to be drawn in 1861, when the Act was passed. After that period no evidence of other Acts can be added to the series of previous Acts to legalize conduct which the Legislature then declared to be illegal. It is said that the appellants had the right to pollute this stream in 1861. I have doubts as to this, because they cannot rely on immemorial prescription. The case is not within Rolle v. Whyte. I doubt whether the claim by prescription is not strictly limited to cases where the user is brought down to the time of action brought, and the case of Leconfield v. Lonsdale seems to be an excuse for such a doubt. The judges there refused to consider the question, and said that it was unnecessary to do so, because the evidence pointed to immemorial user. But for the purposes of the present case it is unnecessary to say more than that the practice to foul this stream by the refuse of a fellmonger's business existed in 1861, but that that practice has been changed. It is said that because the defendants carried on a fellmonger's business so as to foul the stream we ought to infer that the presumed grant under which they acted was to do something more, that is to say, to foul quâ cunque viâ and not by the felling business. It seems to me that where a grant is to be established, it cannot be established by evidence merely of the right to a part. The privilege of fouling a stream in one way cannot supply a right to foul in an altogether different way by new processes never contemplated at the time of the original grant. It has been argued that a mere change of process casting no additional burden ought not to destroy such a right. But no such inference can be drawn from Baxendale v. McMurray, which was relied on for that purpose. It was there decided by a court of equity adjudicating on the law and the facts of the case that the reasonable inference was that the grant to be presumed was to foul the river by way of a paper-mill, and that it was unreasonable to suppose that such a grant, if so to be presumed, was limited to any particular process. The defendant in that case might have had a case made against him either that there had been a change in the enjoyment or an excess of burden imposed on the servient tenement, and although the plaintiff might have failed to prove the first, he would have succeeded if he had proved the second contention.

Patent—Action for injunction against threats—Cross-action for infringement—Liberty to apply for disclaimer in action for infringement—Application for writ of prohibition against Comptroller—Patents Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 18, sub-section 10; s. 19.

An action for an injunction against threats of legal proceedings and a cross-action for infringement having been commenced between two parties in relation to a patent, the plaintiffs in the cross-action for infringement obtained leave from the judge before whom the action was entered to apply to the Comptroller-General to amend their specification by way of disclaimer, whereupon the plaintiffs in the first action for the injunction applied for a writ of prohibition against the hearing by the Comptroller of the application to disclaim, on the ground that "legal proceedings in relation to the patent were pending" under section 18, sub-section 10, of the Patents Act, 1883.

Held, that no prohibition would lie, and that, when liberty to apply to disclaim under section 19 of the Patents Act, 1883, had been given, the proceedings detailed in section 18 of that Act are available, notwithstanding that other legal proceedings in relation to the patent are pending.

Appeal from Denman, J.'s refusal at chambers to grant a writ of prohibition.

The following are the material facts in this case. The Haslam Foundry and Engineering Co., as owners of a patent refrigerative system, had brought an action against Messrs. Hall & Co. for an infringement of their patent. This action was tried on August 1, 1887, before Stephen, J., and judgment was entered for the defendants, Messrs. Hall, on the ground that the second claim of the plaintiffs had been anticipated, but he further held that the residue of their claim was new, and had been infringed. On the 22nd of March, 1887, Messrs. Goodfellow & Matthews had commenced an action an injunction against the Haslam Foundry Co. for threats issued by them within the meaning of section 32 of the Patents Act, 1883, and asked for an injunction. On the 28th of March the Haslam Foundry Co. commenced a cross-action for alleged infringement of their patent against Messrs. Goodfellow & Matthews. On the 5th of April, by consent, an order was made that all proceedings in this action should be stayed until further order, including in the stay the application by Messrs. Goodfellow & Matthews for an injunction. On the 2nd of December, 1887, the Haslam Foundry Co., after the judgment in their action against Messrs. Hall, applied to Kay, J., for leave to apply to the Patent Office to enter a disclaimer in respect of their second claim, and to amend their specification. Kay, J., gave them leave to apply (see ante, p. 391), and they accordingly proceeded to apply for leave before the Comptroller-General so to amend.

Their action against Messrs. Goodfellow & Matthews was, subject to the above order, still pending before Kay, J. Upon the Haslam Foundry Co. obtaining leave to apply to amend their specification, Messrs. Goodfellow & Matthews applied to Denman, J., for a writ of prohibition to prevent the Comptroller-General from hearing the application of the Haslam Foundry Co., on the ground that an action for infringement and legal proceedings in relation to the same patent were pending, and that the Comptroller had, under such circumstances, no jurisdiction to entertain the application.

Denman, J., refused the application, and against this refusal Messrs. Goodfellow & Matthews now appealed.

Moulton, Q.C., and Bousfield, for the appellants.—The action for threats brought by the appellants is a pending legal proceeding in relation to the patent within section 18, sub-section 10, of the Patents Act, 1883, and ousts the Comptroller's jurisdiction under sub-section 19 to hear applications for disclaimer. Their application to disclaim is an admission by the Haslam Foundry Co. that their cross-action on this patent against the appellants cannot be sustained: Fusee Vesta Co. v. Bryant & May, 35 W. R. 267, 34 Ch. D. 458. The patentee must get leave to apply to disclaim in all actions if more than one are pending. Here they have only got leave in the one. Each legal proceeding is a bar to the Comptroller's jurisdiction. "Legal proceedings" are used in section 28 in a wider sense than in sections 18 and 19, and the judgment of Chitty, J., in Cropper v. Smith, 33 W. R. 338, 28 Ch. D. 149, does not apply. Excepting an action for threats there could not be an action in relation to a patent which is neither an action for infringement or petition for revocation: Kurtz v. Spence, ante, p. 438, 36 Ch. D. 770.

Ingle Joyce appeared for the Comptroller-General.

CAYE, J.—I think the order of Denman, J., was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed. The case turns upon the construction of sections 18 and 19 of the Patents Act, 1883. Up to that Act patents had constantly been evaded or infringed by technicalities, and because something or other had been omitted in the specification, which was of no really substantial value to the thing patented, the patentee lost his right to protection and his costs in actions in which he ought to have succeeded, so far as his patent had been substantially infringed. Section 18 was, I presume, an attempt to prevent such occurrences by giving patentees power to apply to the Patent Office to amend their specifications by disclaimer, correction, or explanation. As a consequence of this power being given parties could not be allowed to go as a matter of course to the office whenever legal proceedings in reference to the patent or an action for its infringement were pending, but by section 19, "in an action for infringement of a patent, and in a proceeding for revocation of a patent, the court or judge may at any time order that the patentee shall," subject to certain conditions, "be at liberty to apply to the Patent Office for leave to amend his specification by way of disclaimer." Nothing is said as to the process to be followed upon such an application to amend, but I think that it is quite clear that the proceedings detailed in section 18 are meant to apply in every case in which an application to amend is made to the Patent Office, and I am satisfied that the leave given by Kay, J., in the action for infringement between the present parties was within the section, although nothing was actually said as to there being more actions than this one pending between the parties. It is said that the consequences of amendment being allowed under these circumstances works such injustice that the section must be meant to be read differently. I am not at all convinced that any injustice results from this plain construction of the section. I am not satisfied that the object of this leave being given to apply to amend was intended solely for the benefit of the persons engaged in the different actions.

It might very well be intended that the judge should be able to see for himself the sort of amendment which it was desired to make, and the kind of disadvantage in which the patentee was placed for want of it, and should not allow any amendment to be made in cases where some substantial alteration in the patent would ensue, but that where it was manifest that the patentee's rights might be endangered for want of some technical amendments in his specification leave should be given for disclaimer or correction, so that all pending litigation might be equitably disposed of. After such leave has been given by a judge all parties who like are at liberty to come in and be heard by the Comptroller, who has discretion to amend subject to such conditions as he may think proper and just to impose upon the parties applying. In what way does this work injustice? I cannot see that any such injustice is involved as ought to make the reading of an Act of Parliament contrary to its natural meaning. I do not think the fact that a person will be deprived of raising certain technical defences in relation to a patent any ground for relief. The only ground alleged is that in some other action a judge may construe another section of the Act in a non-natural way and thereby bring about an unjust result. That is not sufficient reason for departing from the language of the Act. The respondents were clearly within the statute in making their application, and Denman, J., was right in refusing to prohibit such an application.

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is certainly a most novel application. Some months ago, in March, 1887, I think, a Messrs. Goodfellow & Mathews bring an action against the Haslam Foundry Co. under section 32 of the Patents Act as persons aggrieved by threats of the foundry company, issued in relation to their patent. The foundry company thereupon commence an action for infringement against Messrs. Goodfellow & Mathews. Subsequently an injunction is drawn up by consent staying proceedings till further order. Pending this, the action of the Foundry Company v. Hall is adjudicated upon by Stephen, J., and the plaintiff's specification is held to be insufficient on one point claimed, and is thereby rendered invalid. The plaintiffs did not apply to disclaim at the trial in the infringement action against Goodfellow & Mathews, but they apply to Kay, J., for leave to disclaim that part of the specification which Stephen, J., had held to be wrong in the first action, and Kay, J., ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty to apply to the office for that purpose. That order is not appealed against, but it is said now that the proceeding was altogether wrong, and that a prohibition must issue against the Comptroller for obeying an order of the Superior Court made under section 19. I will not say here what the words "legal proceedings" are intended to include under sub-section 10 of section 18, because it is immaterial so to decide, nor whether the action for threats is a "legal proceeding in relation to a patent," nor what are the limits of "due diligence" in prosecuting infringement actions. All these points are immaterial to the present issue.

Amendment of specifications is allowed by disclaimer, correction, or explanation under section 18. Sub-section 10 is enacted to prevent a person going behind the back of other legal proceedings in reference to the patent, and getting his specification amended. Section 19 is for the purpose of preventing a patentee being defeated by merely technical blunders in his specification. Kay, J., had full jurisdiction to make the order under section 19, and the Comptroller cannot be restrained from obeying that order.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from a judgment of the judge of the county court at Bow.

In January, 1885, the Hackney Board of Works, having paved a new street under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, made an apportionment of the expenses so incurred under section 77 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, in which they apportioned a certain sum to the defendant as the owner of three houses in the said street.

In June an order was made for the payment of the expenses so apportioned by instalments, and one such instalment was paid by the defendant.

On the 30th of July the defendant contracted to sell the three houses to the plaintiff, and in September he duly executed a conveyance thereof to the plaintiff, conveying as beneficial owner.

The plaintiff, having paid the balance of the apportionment to the board of works, brought this action to recover the amount so paid from the defendant.

By section 77 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, the vestry or district board is empowered to apportion the expenses of paving a new street on the frontagers, and to accept payment thereof by instalments, "and any such amount shall be recoverable from the present or any future owner of the premises."

By section 7, sub-section 1 (A), of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, when a vendor conveys as beneficial owner, there is an implied covenant that the property is conveyed freed and discharged from all "estates, incumbrances, claims, and demands . . . made, occasioned, or suffered" by the vendor.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant.

Spokes, for the plaintiff.—The defendant is liable to indemnify the plaintiff by virtue of the implied covenant given by section 7 of the Conveyancing Act. These expenses come within the meaning of the words "incumbrance, claim, or demand." Section 77 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, in order to secure the payment of these expenses, imposes a kind of indirect charge on the land: Vestry of Bermondsey v. Ramsey, 19 W. R. 774, L. R. 6 C. P. 247; In re Bettesworth and Richer, ante, p. 544, 37 Ch. D. 535.

C. E. Jones, for the defendant, was not called upon.

Field, J.—The plaintiff must show a covenant on the part of the defendant to indemnify him against the payment of these expenses. The defendant conveyed as beneficial owner, and such conveyance carries the implied covenant for freedom from incumbrance set forth in section 7 of the Conveyancing Act. Does this claim come within that covenant? I am of opinion that it does not. It would have been different if it had been a claim under the Public Health Act, 1875; for the words of that Act are different, and expressly make paving expenses a charge on the land, as was held in In re Bettesworth and Richer. But in this Metropolis Management Act there are no such words; and I think that these expenses were merely a claim or demand on the defendant personally up to the time of the sale, and did not affect the land. I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the effect of section 77 of the Metropolis Management Act is to impose successive personal liabilities on successive owners, which is a very different thing from a charge on land.

Appeal dismissed.

British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Co., Appellants; Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co., Respondents. (a.)

Water rate—Unoccupied house under £10—Liability of owner—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17), s. 72—Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co.'s Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. clviii.), s. 58.

The owner of a house not exceeding the annual value of £10, who is liable for the payment of water rate instead of the occupier thereof, is not liable for the said rates while the house remains unoccupied, although water is supplied to the pipes on the premises.

This was a special case stated by one of the metropolitan magistrates for the opinion of this court.

A complaint was preferred by the respondents against the appellants, on the ground that they had been supplied with water by the respondent company at Nos. 221, 231, 226, and 222, Crystal Palace-road, Nos. 32 and 30, Heber-road, Nos. 3, 5, 7, 9, 4, and 14, Silvester-road, Nos. 23, 25, and 27, Landcroft-road, for which they had not paid, and were then liable to pay, the respondents' charges, amounting to £7 1s., for two quarters' water supply up to Midsummer, 1887.

The material facts were as follows:—

(1.) The houses Nos. 221, 231, 226, Crystal Palace-road were occupied during both quarters to Midsummer, 1887.

The house No. 4, Silvester-road was occupied during the quarter from Christmas, 1886, to Lady-day, 1887, only.

The remaining houses were unoccupied during the two quarters in respect of which the rates were claimed, and had previously been unoccupied for and during various periods, as the respondents were aware, but no claim for payment of rates in respect thereof had been made upon the owner until the present time.

(2.) During the said two quarters each of the said houses was under the annual value of £20, and the appellants were the owners thereof, for which, according to the company's Act, the owner was to be liable instead of the occupier.

(3.) Communication pipes connecting the said houses respectively with the pipes of the respondents were laid before the commencement of the said two quarters, and the same had not been cut off by the respondents, nor had the water been stopped from flowing into the said houses, nor had any notice to discontinue the supply to any of the said houses been given to the respondents by the appellants or by anyone else.

(4.) None of the water so supplied had been used by the appellants, nor, so far as their knowledge extended, by any other person.

The appellants did not dispute their liability to pay the respondents' charges in respect of the houses occupied during the aforesaid periods, and the question for the court was whether they were also liable to pay the rates in respect of the houses unoccupied during those periods.

Bompas, Q.C. (R. Burnet Morris with him), for the appellants.—The general law as to water rates is contained in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17). Sections 68—74 provide for the payment and recovery of the rates. By section 68 the rate is made payable by the person using the water. By section 70 the rates are made payable in advance, so that the company can always have notice when the house becomes unoccupied, and can cut off the supply. By section 71 the occupier of any dwelling-house who shall give notice of his intention to discontinue the use of the water supplied, or who shall remove from his dwelling between any two quarterly days of payment, shall pay the water rate for the quarter ending on the quarterly day of payment next after his quitting or giving such notice. Then section 12 enacts that "The owners of all dwelling-houses or parts of dwelling-houses occupied as separate tenements, the annual value of which houses or tenements shall not exceed the sum of £10, shall be liable to the payment of the rates instead of the occupiers thereof; and the powers and provisions herein, or in the special Act, contained for the recovery of rates from occupiers shall be construed to apply to the owners of such houses and tenements; and the person receiving the rents of any such house or tenement as aforesaid from the occupier thereof, on his own account, or as agent or receiver for any person interested therein, shall be deemed the owner of such house or tenement." This is merely a provision that in such cases the rate shall be collected by the landlord and paid over by him to the company. Section 58 of the respondents' private Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. clviii.) provides that "the owners of all houses or parts of houses occupied as separate tenements, not respectively exceeding the annual value of £20, shall, during such time as the same shall be supplied with water by the company, be liable to the payment of the rates chargeable in respect thereof under the authority of this Act instead of the occupiers thereof." And the "owner" is defined in similar words to those in the principal Act. This section merely changes the limit from £10 to £20. Section 74 of the principal Act gives the company power to stop the supply of water. The owner is therefore liable "instead of the occupier," and in the same way. By section 71, in the case of unoccupied houses exceeding the annual value of £10, neither the owner nor last occupier is liable for water rate except as in manner therein provided—that is, so long as he remains in possession, but no longer. [He was stopped by the court.]

R. A. McCall (Pyland with him), for the respondents.—Payment of the rates might have been demanded in advance, and, if paid, the mere fact that the houses became unoccupied afterwards would have been no ground for claiming a return of them. An occupier may put an end to his liability in two ways. He may give notice to discontinue or he may cease to be an occupier. The owner of these houses is placed in the same position as the occupier, and in order to rid himself of liability he must either discontinue or cease to be an owner. The owner or occupier, on giving notice to the company to connect his house with the main, thereupon becomes liable for the rate, and as long as the supply is within the communication pipe the occupier or owner remains liable. If the water escapes it does so at the risk of the occupier or owner, not of the company. It is true that in the case of houses over £20 the company can cut off the water; but here they have got the owner to look to instead. The owner knows when his house becomes unoccupied, and ought to give notice. If it is the company's business to cut off the supply, they will be put to expense and inconvenience in finding out which houses are occupied and which not.

Cleasby, J.—It is clear that in this case the magistrate came to a wrong conclusion, and that the owners of these houses are not liable for the water rates after quarter day next after the time when the houses became unoccupied has arrived. Section 58 of the company's private Act, which is the same as section 72 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, with the exception that it raises the annual value from £10 to £20, provides that "the owners of houses under the annual value of £20 shall be liable to pay the water rates "instead of the occupiers thereof." It has been contended that the words in section 58, "during such time as the same shall be supplied with water by the company," renders the owner liable so long as water is in the pipes. I am of opinion that no such meaning was intended to be put upon those words, and that they were merely inserted "ex majore cautela." These words cannot control the language of the Act. If it was intended to make the owner pay when the occupier was not liable, or when there was no occupier to be liable, the Legislature have not expressed that intention plainly. In my opinion, therefore, the appellants are not liable to pay this rate.

A. L. Smith, J.—The meaning of section 72 of the Waterworks Clauses Act clearly is that where the occupier would be liable were the houses over £10 the owner is to be liable, and where he would not be so liable the owner is not. The magistrate has decided this case, in construing section 58 of the company's private Act, to mean that the owner is liable so long as water is in the communication pipes of the houses. But when we see that these words in section 58 also apply to parts of houses occupied as separate tenements, it seems clear that such a construction could not have been intended by the Legislature. In my opinion the decision of the magistrate must be reversed.

Prohibition—Mayor's Court—Telegram—Order sent to City by telegraph.

An order sent from without the City by telegraph to an agent within the City, and accepted by the agent in a reply sent from within the City through the same medium, is a contract made within the City.

This was an application for a writ of prohibition to the Mayor's Court and to the plaintiff in the action. The matter had been referred from chambers to this court.

The plaintiff claimed £256 from the defendant on accounts stated. The plaintiff had telegraphed from a post-office in Regent-street, without the City, to the defendant at Ludgate-circus, within the City, directing him to put certain moneys as bets on racehorses, and gave an address at a club without the City. The defendant replied by telegram within the City to the said club. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had, in consequence of the above directions, received the above amount for him as his agent.

Danckwerts, in support of the application for a prohibition.—Assuming that the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant is one of agency, even then the cause of action did not arise within the City, and therefore the Mayor's Court had no jurisdiction. The whole cause must arise within the City: Cooke v. Gill, 21 W. R. 334, L. R. 8, C. P. 107. Here the post-office was the agent of the parties, as explained in Byrne v. Van Tienhoven, 5 C. P. D. 344, 28 W. R. Dig. 55, and the authority was given, if given at all, to the agent without the City.

F. Watt, against the prohibition.—The whole transaction took place in the City. The telegram was a mere medium of communication, as a conduit pipe or tube.

Manisty, J.—As the amount sued for exceeds £50, it is necessary that the whole cause of action should arise within the City in order to give jurisdiction to the Mayor's Court. The plaintiff sent his order to the defendant by telegram, and that is exactly the same as if he had sent a letter through the post-office to the defendant. Until the telegram reached the defendant he had no authority. But he received the communication—the telegram—in the City, and answered it in the City. It has been argued that the authority, if given, was given outside the City, and therefore the authority to the telegraph office to send the telegram must be proved. That is not so; it is only necessary to prove the receipt of the order by the defendant direct from the plaintiff, and the receipt of the answer direct. It is not necessary to prove that the post-office had authority to send the telegram; it is a mere channel of communication between the parties, and they are in the same position as if they had met together to contract their bargain. We cannot grant a prohibition in this case.

The court cannot order the prosecution of a bankrupt under section 16 of the Debtors Act, 1869, in respect of offences alleged to have been committed under section 11, sub-sections 13, 14, and 15 of the said Act within four months next before the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, where such petition has been presented by the bankrupt himself.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Selfe in the county court at Canterbury, refusing an application made by William Wood, a creditor of the bankrupt, for an order under section 16 of the Debtors Act, 1869, for the prosecution of the bankrupt, for offences committed by him within the meaning of section 11, sub-sections 13, 14, and 15 of the said Act.

In the present case the bankrupt had filed his own petition, and the application for his prosecution was refused by the county court judge on the ground that the case was not brought within sub-sections 13, 14, and 15 of section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, as those sub-sections only make the acts therein specified criminal offences if done by the debtor "within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him," whereas here the petition was not presented "against" him, but "by" him; and that these sub-sections were not extended by section 163 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to the case of a bankrupt presenting a petition against himself, inasmuch as sub-section (1) of section 163 only substitutes the words "after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him" for the words "after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him," and does not alter the words in sub-sections 13, 14, and 15, "before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him" to "before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him."

The court being of opinion that a sufficient primâ facie case might otherwise be shown for directing a prosecution, the creditor now appealed.

Morton Smith, for the appellant.—This case is really covered by the decision in Ex parte Gould, In re Walker, 13 Q. B. D. 454, 32 W. R. Dig. 167. The effect of the refusal to order a prosecution must be to allow a fraudulent bankrupt to escape the consequences of his conduct where the offences are committed previous to the presentation of the petition. The court had power to direct a prosecution notwithstanding the manner in which section 163 of the Bankruptcy Act has been drawn.

CAVE, J.—The question is one of some little difficulty, but I have come to the conclusion that the county court judge was right in refusing this application, and that what the debtor has done here is not an offence within the Act. By section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, any person adjudged bankrupt, and any person whose affairs are liquidated by arrangement in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, shall, in each of the cases following, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and, on conviction, be liable to imprisonment, that is to say (sub-section 13):—"If within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, or the commencement of the liquidation, he, by any false representation or other fraud, has obtained any property on credit, and has not paid for the same." Now under the Act then in force—viz., the Bankruptcy Act, 1869—a bankruptcy petition could only be presented by a creditor and not by a debtor, and if a debtor wished to take advantage of the Act he presented a liquidation petition. Then we come to the statute of 1883, which made large alterations in bankruptcy proceedings, and swept away liquidations and made a petition the starting point in the case both of the creditor and of the debtor. The result of that is that the words of sub-section 13 no longer expressly apply. The petition is presented by the debtor, and there is no longer any liquidation. Section 149 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has been relied upon to get over that difficulty, which provides, by sub-section (2), that "where by any Act or instrument reference is made to the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the Act or instrument shall be construed and have effect as if reference were made therein to the corresponding provisions of this Act." That section received an interpretation in the case of Ex parte Gould, In re Walker, and I adhere to the view I expressed in that case, that where there is a reference in a lease to the Act of 1869 the lease is to be construed as if the reference was to the corresponding provisions of the Act of 1883. But there would arise a difficulty in this case if matters stood there from the well-known maxim that a man cannot be made a criminal except by direct expression of the Act of Parliament; he cannot be made a criminal merely by inference. That would cause me to hesitate whether the Legislature intended section 149 to apply to the Debtors Act, 1869, which creates offences, and when I come to section 163 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, my ground for hesitation is confirmed. Section 163 provides, by sub-section (1), that "sections eleven and twelve of the Debtors Act, 1869, relating to the punishment of fraudulent debtors, and imposing a penalty for absconding with property, shall have effect as if there were substituted therein for the words, 'if after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him,' the words 'if after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him.'"

It follows from that section that the Legislature had before it sections 11 and 12 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and I cannot suppose that it was ignorant that, under section 11, there were certain acts which were offences if done "before" the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, and yet, having the whole section before their eyes, the Legislature restricted itself to offences "after" the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him. So, whatever I might have been inclined to decide if section 149 stood alone, when I find that section 163 omits those very important words, and that the Legislature expressly confined itself to acts after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him, I must take it that it did not intend to extend to acts before the presentation of a petition by him. It may be a casus omissus, but I must conclude that, where the offences are those before the presentation of the petition, and the petition is by the debtor himself, the case is not provided for by the Act, and a prosecution cannot be directed.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I must confess that at one time I was in some little doubt, but I have arrived at the same conclusion. We are dealing with a criminal case, and we must see that the case comes within the words of the statute. This debtor is clearly not within the words "if within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him," neither is he within the words "or the commencement of the liquidation." But it is said that, by section 149 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the commencement of a liquidation means the same thing as a petition of a bankrupt by himself, and according to the decision in Ex parte Gould, In re Walker, that would seem to be so. But as my brother Cave has pointed out, I am met by section 163 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The Legislature was there dealing with two sections of the Debtors Act, it had the Debtors Act before it, and yet the Legislature takes care to say that the sections shall have effect as if there were substituted therein for the words "if after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him" the words "if after a presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him"—that is, they amend all the clauses down to sub-section 12, and purposely leave unamended sub-sections 13, 14, and 15. It is argued that that is a blunder, but I do not feel myself entitled to say that, and the decision of the county court judge must be upheld.

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.)

Municipalities Act (New South Wales), 1867—Bye-law—Regulation and prohibition—Unreasonableness.

A bye-law framed under the Municipalities Act (New South Wales), 1867, s. 153, which authorizes regulation of interments within the municipality, held not to be ultrà vires in that it practically prohibited interments in a certain cemetery, and thus interfered with the private rights of owners of ground therein.

As to whether, and in what circumstances, a bye-law may be set aside for unreasonableness, quære.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, dated the 23rd of November, 1885, affirming a conviction before a justice of the peace for the infringement of a bye-law of the council of the borough of Petersham.

The question raised was as to the validity of the said bye-law, which purported to regulate interments within the said borough.

The facts appear at length in their lordships' judgment.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Leverson, for the appellant.—The court below was wrong in considering themselves bound by the decisions in Ex parte Flack, 1 N. S. Wales L. R. 27, and Brooks v. Selwyn, 3 N. S. Wales L. R. 256. The power of regulation given by the Municipalities Act (31 Vict. No. 2), s. 153, related only to public cemeteries. To prohibit burials altogether in this cemetery is ultrà vires: Western Railway Co. v. Windsor and Annapolis Railway Co., 7 App. Cas. 178, 30 W. R. Dig. 31; Wortley v. Nottingham Local Board, 21 L. T. N. S. 582, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 67; Heap v. Burnley Union, 32 W. R. 661, 12 Q. B. D. 617; Wansted Local Board of Health v. Wooster, 38 J. P. 21. The bye-law was unreasonable: Quin v. Wood, 5 E. & B. 49; Master and Company of Framework Knitters v. Green, 1 Lord Raym. 113.

Jeune, Q.C., and C. E. Jones, for the respondent.—The conviction was right. Regulation includes prohibition where the circumstances justify it. The prohibition is not unreasonable if compared with those of the English Burial Acts from 1850 to 1854.

Sir H. Davey in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—The judgment of their lordships (Lord HOBHOUSE, Lord HERSCHELL, Lord MACNAGHTEN, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord HOBHOUSE.—The sole question in this case is whether a bye-law, under which the appellant has been convicted and fined, is valid or invalid. The bye-law was passed by the Municipal Council of the borough of Petersham on the 2nd of December, 1884, under the provisions of the Municipalities Act, 1867. The respondent is the inspector of nuisances for the borough. The appellant appealed to the Supreme Court, and the convicting magistrate stated a case, which contains the facts on which the decision of that court was passed. It affirmed the decision of the magistrate, and their lordships are now asked to decide that the affirmance was wrong.

The material portion of the bye-law is in the following terms:—"No corpse shall be interred in any existing cemetery now open for burials within the distance of one hundred yards from any public building, place of worship, schoolroom, dwelling-house, public pathway, street, road, or place whatsoever within the borough." A similar provision was made with respect to cemeteries afterwards opened.

Section 153 of the Municipalities Act provides that the council may from time to time make bye-laws for (among other things) regulating the interment of the dead. The bye-law was published in the New South Wales Government Gazette on the 19th of January, 1885, where it is stated to have been confirmed by his Excellency the Governor, with the advice of the Executive Council.

On the 27th of June, 1885, the appellant interred the corpse of his wife in his own family burial-place in the Roman Catholic cemetery in Petersham. This cemetery had, from the year 1862 onwards, been used for the interment of members of the Roman Catholic faith; and in the year 1879 the appellant purchased a portion of it as a permanent burial-place for members of his family. No part of the cemetery is distant more than 100 yards from a place of worship, schoolroom, dwelling-house, public street, road, or place within the borough. It is admitted that the place is not a populous one.

The Supreme Court was unanimous in its decision. But of the three judges, only the Chief Justice, Sir James

Martin, agreed with the decision on principle. The other two, Fancett and Innes, JJ., would have decided the other way if they had not thought themselves bound by two previous decisions on similar bye-laws of other municipalities under the same statute. Under these circumstances the case was a proper one for appeal to her Majesty in Council.

The appellant takes three objections to the validity of the bye-law; first, that it is ultrà vires because it destroys private property; secondly, that it is ultrà vires because the council have only power of regulating interments, whereas in the cemetery in question they have wholly prohibited them; and, thirdly, that it is unreasonable. These objections must be judged by reference to the provisions of the Municipalities Act, the material sections being those numbered 153 and 158. The former gives to the council the power of making bye-laws to provide for the health of the municipality, as well as to regulate the interment of the dead.

In support of the first objection, their lordships have been referred to cases in which Acts of the Legislature would, according to their full literal meaning, operate to take away private property without compensation; and in which courts of justice have, on account of the extreme improbability that the Legislature should have intended such a thing, sought for some secondary meaning to satisfy its expressions; such as was the case of Western Railway Co. v. Windsor and Annapolis Railway Co. before this board. But a statute cannot be so construed if it shows an intention to override the private rights in question. The object of the present statute is to establish regulations for the common advantage of persons who have come to live in the same community, in a great number of matters affecting their daily life, and that cannot be done except by interference with many actions and many modes of enjoying property, which, but for such regulations, would be lawful and innocent. It is difficult to see how the council can make efficient bye-laws for such objects as preventing fires, preventing and regulating places of amusement, regulating the killing of cattle and sale of butcher's meat, preventing bathing, providing for the general health, not to mention others, unless they have substantial powers of restraining people, both in their freedom of action and in their enjoyment of property.

The interment of the dead is just one of those affairs in which it would be likely to occur that no regulation would meet the case except one which wholly prevented the desired or accustomed use of the property. It may well be that a plot of ground, having been originally far from habitations, and suitably used as the burying place of a family or a religious society, has been reached by the growing town, and has so become unsuitable for the purpose. In such a case a power to regulate would be nugatory unless it involved a power to stop the burials altogether. Their lordships hold that the bye-law in question is not ultrà vires because in certain circumstances it may have, as in Mr. Slattery's case it unfortunately has, the effect of taking away an enjoyment of property for which alone that property was acquired and has been used.

The considerations applicable to the second objection have, to a great extent, been anticipated by the answer to the first. It is true that, in regulating the interment of the dead, the bye-law makes the cemetery useless for its former purpose. This, it is argued, is not regulation but prohibition, and it is pointed out that, with regard to several objects of the bye-laws, prevention and suppression are expressly allowed by the Act, whereas in the case of interment only regulation is allowed. One illustration of regulation proper, as distinct from prohibition, was found in another bye-law laying down rules as to the number of corpses in a grave and their depth below the surface. Now if, at the passing of the bye-law, a grave was already so full that it could not, consistently with the bye-law, receive another corpse, the bye-law would amount to a complete prohibition of burial, although the owner of the grave may have contemplated that in death he should be laid by those whom he loved best in life.

To regulate the place of burial is certainly one of the most important points in regulating burials for the health of a community, perhaps the most important of all. It is indeed a serious thing to prevent people from indulging their affections in a matter which they justly consider so sacred as the disposal of their dead. Such prohibitions should be well considered before they are passed. But they are undoubtedly necessary in large and growing communities. And their lordships cannot hold that a bye-law is ultrà vires because, in laying down a general regulation for the borough of Petersham, it has the effect of closing a particular cemetery.

It is contended that the bye-law is unreasonable on three grounds. First, that it is not wanted, the place not being populous. Secondly, that it does not, as is usually done in England, make any provision for the case of a person who may have a special claim to use the prohibited burying place. Thirdly, that a belt of 100 yards must be kept vacant all round a cemetery, which will be onerous for all, and probably impossible for some; otherwise any private owner of land may, without regard for any interest but his own, or even from malice, place a dwelling-house in such a position as to prevent future burials.

As regards the necessity for the bye-law, there is no evidence whatever on which their lordships can form an opinion. It is merely said that the place is not a populous one. Even supposing that the place mentioned means the borough of Petersham, and not merely the neighbourhood of the cemetery, which is not clear, the statement is far too vague to be of any use. It may be quite populous enough to require such a bye-law. The matter is one on which the judgment of the local authorities should not be lightly superseded.

The other two grounds are more substantial. It is possible that if we were now discussing how the bye-law should be framed, it might seem more wise and prudent to make it less absolute. It might be wiser, even at the expense of some inconvenience to the community, to make some concession to one of the most softening and refining of human feelings, the reverence and love that is felt for the dead, and the desire of resting in the same spot with them. It might be more prudent not to give any person the means of disturbing a cemetery by the mere building of a house. But supposing that to be so, it is quite a different question whether a bye-law like the present one is to be held unreasonable because such considerations have been overlooked or rejected by its framers.

The jurisdiction of testing bye-laws by their reasonableness was originally applied in such cases as those of manorial bodies, towns, or corporations having inherent powers or general powers conferred by charter of making such laws. As new corporations or local administrative bodies have arisen, the same jurisdiction has been exercised over them. But in determining whether or no a bye-law is reasonable, it is material to consider the relation of its framers to the locality affected by it, and the authority by which it is sanctioned.

We are dealing with the proceedings of a local authority in a colony, where the extent of area is large and population grows fast. The Act of 1867 provides methods for the more effectual establishment of local institutions. It creates a representative council, elected annually by the constituency, and gives to it jurisdiction over the large range of affairs enumerated in section 153 and some other sections. By section 158 it is enacted that all bye-laws "consistent with the provisions of this Act, and not repugnant to any other Act or law in force in the colony of New South Wales, shall have the force of law when confirmed by the governor and published in the Government Gazette, but not sooner or otherwise." And provision is made for laying copies of such bye-laws before both Houses of Parliament.

It is certainly not clear that courts of law are not precluded by section 158 from inquiry whether or no a bye-law is reasonable. Sir Horace Davey argued on this point that it is a necessary condition of every bye-law that it shall be reasonable, that a power to make bye-laws means a power to make reasonable bye-laws, and that no bye-law can acquire the force of law under section 158 except such as is consistent with the implied as well as the express provisions of the Act. According to this argument, the question whether a bye-law is reasonable is only one branch of the question whether it is ultrà vires.

If it were possible to conceive that a council such as that of Petersham could frame, and that the Governor of New South Wales could confirm and publish, a merely fantastic and capricious bye-law, such as reasonable men could not make in good faith, such, for instance, as a bye-law providing that the Roman Catholic cemetery should be closed to the Roman Catholic community, but remain available for others, it would raise in a very crucial shape the question whether a court of law could set it aside as unreasonable. Let it be assumed, notwithstanding section 158 of the Act, that such a jurisdiction exists. It is quite a different question whether a bye-law can be treated as unreasonable merely because it does not contain qualifications which commend themselves to the minds of judges.

Every precaution has been taken by the Legislature to ensure, first, that the council shall represent the feelings and interests of the community for which it makes laws; secondly, that, if it is mistaken, its composition may promptly be altered; thirdly, that its bye-laws shall be under the control of the supreme executive authority; and, fourthly, that ample opportunity shall be given to criticize them in either House of Parliament. Their lordships feel strong reluctance to question the reasonable character of bye-laws made under such circumstances, and doubt whether they ought to be set aside as unreasonable by a court of law, unless it be in some very extreme case, such as has been indicated.

In the present case, so far from there being ground for thinking the bye-law to be capricious or oppressive, there is good evidence that the communities of New South Wales consider that bye-laws of this nature are reasonable and suitable to their circumstances. In the case of Ex parte Flack, which was decided in 1880, it appeared that a bye-law had been passed by the municipality of Leichardt and gazetted on the 8th of April, 1875, to the same effect with the Petersham bye-law, except that the prescribed distance was 100 feet instead of 100 yards. A conviction for infraction of that bye-law was upheld by the Supreme Court. The same view was taken in Brooks v. Selwyn, decided in 1882, when a bye-law identical with the Petersham bye-law was passed by the borough of Newcastle, and gazetted on the 27th of August, 1881. In this case the justices refused to convict, on the ground that the bye-law was ultrà vires, and the Supreme Court reversed their decision. It is clear then that, at least from the year 1875, municipal councils in New South Wales have been passing, and governors in council confirming, bye-laws of this kind; and it does not appear that the Houses of Parliament, on whose tables the bye-laws are placed, have thought it necessary to modify the powers conferred in 1867, or to interfere with their exercise.

The result is that in their lordships' opinion the two prior decisions are right in law; that the court below did right to follow them in this case; that its judgment should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs. They will humbly advise her Majesty in accordance with this opinion.

From Chan. Div. Nov. 14, 15, 17, 19, 21.

PEEK v. DERBY. (a.)

Company—Misrepresentation in prospectus—Liability of directors—Action of deceit—Measure of damages.

An action for damages for deceit will lie against a person who makes an untrue statement as to a fact without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true when the statement is made with a view to its being acted upon by others.

The expression "fraud" considered and explained.

Edgington v. Fitzmaurice, 33 W. R. 911, 29 Ch. D. 459, and Weir v. Bell, 26 W. R. 746, 3 Ex. D. 238, considered.

A tramway company, by its special Act, was authorized, with the consent of the Board of Trade, to use steam or any other mechanical motive power instead of horse power. The directors of the company issued a prospectus which contained a statement that the company, by its special Act, "has the right to use steam or mechanical motive power instead of horses." The plaintiff took shares on the faith of the statement in the prospectus. The Board of Trade refused their consent to the use of steam power, and the company was subsequently wound up.

Held (reversing Stirling, J.), that the directors were liable to the plaintiff in damages in an action of deceit on the ground that the statement in the prospectus was made without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true.

Held, also, that the measure of damages was the difference between the price which the plaintiff paid for the shares and the real value of the shares—as distinguished from their market value—at the time of their allotment to the plaintiff.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of Stirling, J.

The Plymouth, Devonport, and District Tramways Co. was incorporated by special Act of Parliament in 1882, and on the 1st of February, 1883, the directors of the company issued a prospectus dated the 29th of January, 1883, inviting subscriptions for ordinary share capital. This prospectus was headed in large type "Incorporated by special Act of Parliament 45 & 46 Vict., authorizing the use of steam or other mechanical motive power," and it contained the following statement, also in large type:—"One great feature of this undertaking, to which considerable importance should be attached, is that, by the special Act of Parliament, this company has the right to use steam or mechanical motive power instead of horses, and it is fully expected that by the means of this a considerable saving will result in the working expenses of the line as compared with other tramways worked by horses"; and it also stated: "Looking at the exceptional advantages offered by this undertaking from the dense population of the towns it traverses, the unusually favourable conditions as to motive power open to the company, and the annual dividends earned by other tramways which do not enjoy such special privileges, the directors have reason to believe that the enterprize will prove highly remunerative, and the shares now for subscription offer a very favourable opportunity for a sound and progressive investment." The plaintiff was sent a copy of this prospectus, and on the 7th of February, 1883, he applied for 400 shares of £10 each, which were allotted to him, and for which he paid £4,000. The only provisions contained in the special Act with regard to steam or other mechanical motive power were in the 35th section of the Act, which provided that the carriages used on the tramways might, with the consent of the Board of Trade, during a period of seven years after the opening of the same for public traffic, and with the like consent during such further periods, not exceeding seven years, as the board might from time to time specify in any order to be signed by the secretary or assistant-secretary of the board, be moved by steam power or any mechanical power; and by the same section it was provided that the exercise of the power thereby conferred with respect to the use of steam or any mechanical power should be subject as thereby particularly provided, and that the company should not use any steam power or other mechanical power on the said tramway unless and until they should have obtained the provisional consent in writing of the Corporations of Plymouth and Devonport therefor, and for such terms only and subject to such conditions and regulations as the corporations should think fit.

At the time when the prospectus was issued the company had not obtained, and they never did obtain, the consent either of the Board of Trade or of the corporations to the use of steam or other mechanical power on the tramways.

The plaintiff did not immediately commence proceedings against the directors after discovering that the company had not the right to use steam or other mechanical motive power on the tramway, and at a meeting in November, 1884, he expressed himself favourably towards the company and as having confidence in the directors. In February, 1885, the plaintiff commenced this action against the directors for damages in respect of the misstatements in the prospectus by which he had been induced to take the shares. Two days before the commencement of this action a petition had been presented for winding up the company, upon which an order for its winding up had been subsequently made.

The arguments appear sufficiently from the judgments.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., dismissing the plaintiff's action. The action is one which is commonly called an action of deceit, a mere common law action. It is brought against all the persons who were directors of the tramway company at the time when the prospectus was issued. The plaintiff contends that he is entitled to damages on the grounds that there were misstatements in the prospectus by which he was induced to act to his prejudice by taking shares for which he paid £4,000, but which are now much less valuable because the company is wound up.

Before going into the facts of the case I think it best to state what, in my opinion, is the law with reference to such actions, and when it is that a defendant in such an action will be made liable. In my opinion the law may be correctly stated to be this: Where a man makes a statement, to be acted upon by others, which is false, and which is known to him to be false, or which is made by him recklessly or without caring whether it is true or false—that is, without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true—he is liable in an action for deceit at the suit of anyone to whom it was addressed, or of anyone of the class to whom it was addressed, and who was materially induced by the misstatement to do an act to his prejudice. This view of the law is in accordance with what I have stated in several of the cases referred to, and I do not think that Stirling, J., expressed an opinion in any way dissenting from it.

But I do not forget the argument, and I cannot omit referring to the authorities which were much relied on by the respondents in support of that argument—viz., that in order to make a man liable in an action of deceit—that is, on the ground of fraud—it must be made out that the person making the statement acted fraudulently in making it. In Edgington v. Fitzmaurice Bowen, L.J., no doubt said:—"Secondly, it is said that the prospectus contains an implied allegation that there was no other mortgage affecting the property, except the mortgage stated therein. I think there was such an implied allegation, but I think it is not brought home to the defendants that it was made dishonestly; accordingly, although the plaintiff may have been damnified by the weight which he gave to the allegation, he cannot rely on it in this action, for in an action for deceit the plaintiff must prove dishonesty."

That statement taken alone no doubt strongly supports the contention on behalf of the respondents that there must be actual fraud and dishonesty; but one must look and see what Bowen, L.J., stated in the previous part of his judgment would in his opinion be dishonest, and we find that he said this:—"The loss which the plaintiff sustained is not disputed. In order to sustain his action he must first prove that there was a statement as to facts which was false; secondly, that it was false to the knowledge of the defendants, or that they made it not caring whether it was true or false. For it is immaterial whether they made the statement knowing it to be untrue, or recklessly without caring whether it was true or not; because to make a statement recklessly for the purpose of influencing another person is dishonest." So that when he says there must be dishonesty one must look back to the former part of his judgment to see what, in his opinion, would be dishonesty.

Then there is the passage in the judgment of Bramwell, L.J., in Weir v. Bell, which I think Stirling, J., considered as rather opposed to the view of the law I have already expressed in this case and in several of the cases referred to. Bramwell, L.J., said:—"I am of opinion that, with an exception I will presently advert to, to make a man liable for a fraud, moral fraud must be proved against him. I do not understand legal fraud. To my mind it has no more meaning than legal heat or legal cold, legal light or legal shade. There never can be a well-founded complaint of legal fraud or of anything else, except where some duty is shown, and correlative right, and some violation of that duty and right. Now I do not propose to discuss the question whether legal fraud is a happy expression. It is not one which I should adopt.

But the question is whether there is not a duty on the part of those who make statements to be acted upon by others, and whether there is not a right in those other persons to whom the statements are made. In my opinion, when a man makes a statement which he desires that others who receive it should act upon, there is a duty thrown upon the person making the statement—especially when it is made in a prospectus like the present, to be circulated amongst persons in order to induce them to take shares—to take care that there are no statements in the prospectus and no expression in it which are in fact false, and to take care that he has reasonable ground for the material statements which are contained in that document which he intends to be acted on by others, and which he has prepared and circulated for the very purpose of its being acted on by others. And although, in my opinion, it is not necessary hat there should be what I should call fraud, yet in these actions, in my opinion, there must be a departure from duty—that is to say, an untrue statement must have been made without any reasonable ground for believing the statement to be true; and if a person makes a statement to be acted upon by others and has no reasonable ground for believing his statement to be true, then, in my opinion, he has made default in a duty which was thrown upon him from the position he has taken upon himself, and he has violated the right which those who receive the statement have, to have only true statements made to them when they are asked to take shares in a company or to do any other act.

Now, that being so, of course, where a man makes a false statement, knowing it to be untrue, with a view of inducing persons to act upon it, no one would doubt that that is fraud, and I should say further that where a man makes a false statement to induce others to act upon it, without reasonable ground for supposing it to be true, and without taking care to ascertain whether it is true, he is as much liable civilly as the person who commits what is usually called fraud, and makes a misstatement knowing it to be an untruth. And although the expressions of opinion by Bowen, L.J., and by Lord Bramwell in the cases to which I have referred primâ facie support the argument on the part of the respondents here, yet, in my opinion, they are not inconsistent with what I have stated to be the law applicable to cases like the present.

Having stated the law, let us go to the facts of the case. The first point which was argued by Mr. Pearson, and which, I think, it may be convenient to consider, is this, Who were responsible for issuing the prospectus? Now there was only one defendant who contended that he was not answerable. I am not speaking of the liability to the plaintiff in this action, but as not being answerable generally for the statements in the prospectus with the consequences, whatever they may be. Mr. Derry was the only one who contended that he was not answerable for issuing this prospectus. Now as far as I understand the point of Mr. Pearson's argument, which was pressed upon us very ably, it was this, that Derry never saw the draft of this prospectus before it was issued, that he did not attend when it was approved, and that he was not ordinarily at the meetings of the directors. The prospectus in question was dated the 29th of January, 1883. Derry was present at a meeting of directors on the 23rd or 24th of January, 1883, and he then authorized the issue of a prospectus on the basis of a former prospectus, which did not contain the statements contained in the present prospectus. He then went home to Plymouth, and what happened? On the Tuesday, the 6th of February, he received a bundle of a hundred of these prospectuses. It is true that the prospectuses on which the plaintiff acted had been issued before that date. That is the conclusion I come to, as his application for shares was made on the 7th. But what is the course adopted by Mr. Derry? He does not suggest that he did not see the prospectus, and he must be taken to have seen it. He does not in any way object to it. He does not in any way write to say, "This prospectus is not what I authorized, and I cannot adopt it as my prospectus." But he circulates and hands over some of the prospectuses which were sent down to him to other persons. From his never objecting to this prospectus, and from the conduct he adopted as regards the copies of the prospectus sent to him, I come to the conclusion that, even if this prospectus was not in accordance with the authority given by him on the basis of the former prospectus, yet he adopted it, and by his act showed that he recognized it as a prospectus duly in accordance with his directions given at the meeting at which he was present, and he must be answerable for the consequences of this prospectus, just as if he had been present and seen this prospectus when it was finally prepared and before it was issued at all. It is very true, as was urged upon us, that the prospectus upon which the plaintiff acted must have been issued before Mr. Derry actually saw the prospectus; but, in my opinion, as, when he received it, he recognized it as his and adopted it as his, he must be as much liable as any of the other directors, who do not urge that they did not recognize or issue this prospectus.

The next point we have to consider is, What, in fact, is the statement which was relied upon by the plaintiff? I think there were two statements relied upon. First, the heading of this prospectus of the 29th of January, 1883, "Incorporated by special Act of Parliament 45 & 46 Vict., authorizing the use of steam or other mechanical motive power." That heading was relied upon, but I do not think it was what was principally relied upon, and I think it might have been explained away. The statement principally relied on was this, "One great feature of this undertaking, to which considerable importance should be attached, is that, by special Act of Parliament obtained, the company has the right to use steam or mechanical motive power instead of horses, and it is fully expected that by means of this a considerable saving will result in the working expenses of the line as compared with other tramways worked by horses."

Now what was the position of things at this time? By the general Act, unless the special Act authorized it, no motive power could be used except horses. In the 35th section of the special Act there was a provision that "carriages used on the tramways may, subject to the provisions of this Act, be moved by animal power; and, with the consent of the Board of Trade, during a period of seven years after the opening of the same for public traffic, and with the like consent during such further period not exceeding seven years, as the said board may from time to time specify, in any order signed by the assistant-secretary or secretary, by steam power or any mechanical power." It was said in argument that tramway companies were generally divided into two classes—viz., those which could only use horse power and those which could also use steam power; and that the prospectus ought to be read as bringing this company within the division of companies which are freed from the restrictions in the general Act of 1870 and are placed by their special Act in the position of being able to use, not only horse power, but also steam power. Can that be said to be the meaning of the statement in the prospectus? In my opinion it cannot, because it does not speak of the special Act of Parliament as removing the restriction of the general Act, and as giving them power, probably, to obtain authority to use steam power, but it speaks of the company having the right, which must, in my opinion, be the present right at the time when the prospectus was issued, to use steam power. It does not state that if the company obtained authority from the Board of Trade to use steam power the probable result would be that the working expenses would be greatly diminished, but it speaks of the right to use something within the power of the directors, and that by that means the company will as a fact, and not as a mere prospective probable advantage, be enabled to considerably save and reduce the working expenses. That is consistent with the heading of the prospectus, and, in my opinion, the real meaning and the fair construction of the statements contained in the prospectus is that the company at that time had actually and in fact power to do that which would be considerable saving of expense, and would enable the tramways to be worked at a much larger profit than they otherwise could be. But, as I understand it, the great contention on behalf of the directors was that the mere approval by the Board of Trade of the plans which were submitted to them was equivalent to their giving the consent required by the 35th section. I think the view adopted by Stirling, J., was this—viz., that it was probable that the Board of Trade would give the consent and that the directors were justified in making this statement. But I do not think the probability that they would obtain the authority from the Board of Trade is equivalent to the statement which was made. If the statement had been that the consent would probably be obtained, no question could have arisen. Of course the directors would not be liable for merely an expression of opinion which they might well and honestly entertain, and I think probably did entertain, that the Board of Trade would grant their consent. But the statement is not to that effect, but is, in my opinion, a statement that they have, as a positive fact, at the present moment power to use steam.

That being so, I think that the plaintiff has a right to insist that the defendants are liable for the ordinary meaning of the words used by them, because, however much people in their own minds may mean to qualify their statements, if a man makes a statement which, according to its ordinary meaning, bears a particular construction, he is, in my opinion, liable to those who, reading it and construing it reasonably, do give to that statement a construction which is the primary meaning and the fair construction of the words used. And the plaintiff here in his evidence stated that he did treat this as a statement that the company had the absolute right to use steam power for the purposes of locomotion.

Then it has been said that, as the plans of the tramway had been approved by the Board of Trade, they had practically given their consent, and that prevented the statement complained of from being a misstatement, and that the plaintiff must have known that their approval of the line must be obtained. The approval of plans by the board, in my opinion, really goes for nothing, because that only amounts to this, that they approve of the course shown by the plans which were deposited with them, that consent—or approval rather—of the board being necessary before the line could be opened for use, but that is an entirely different matter from the consent which was required by the 35th section. What the officers of the Board of Trade have to do before the line can be opened is to see that the powers given by the Act of Parliament have been properly exercised, and that the line has been properly constructed with due regard to the safety of the public; but the 35th section requires something more; it requires that the board should be satisfied that it is right and proper, having regard to the cases which have come before them, that the company should have the right to use steam; and that is an entirely different thing from seeing whether the company have duly exercised the powers given them: they must see whether, in addition to those powers which are given and which they are to see have been duly exercised, they are willing (for on them is cast the responsibility) that the company should have additional powers to those which a company of this kind generally have. It is true that the special Act gives the board power of considering whether the company is to be taken out of the class prohibited by statute from exercising the right of using steam power; but they have to determine that question independently of the question whether the line is properly constructed.

I have come to the conclusion (I think not differing from Stirling, J., in that) that the statement in the prospectus was that the company had at that moment the absolute power, without any restriction, to use steam for the purpose of propelling their carriages, and that that statement was false.

Then we must consider whether the defendants had reasonable ground for believing the statement to be true. Some of the defendants say that they knew that no consent had been given by the Board of Trade. One gentleman, Mr. Moore, says that he acted on the statements of, and trusted to the solicitors who seem to have prepared the prospectus. As regards the defendants, who admit that they actually knew the facts, if the statement bears the construction I have put upon it, it cannot be said they did not know that the statement they were making was untrue. As regards Mr. Moore, had he reasonable ground for believing it to be true? If this had been a clause which he had said he had read and did not understand, and asked the solicitors to explain it, the case would have stood very differently. But I think this is what his meaning must be, that he accepted this prospectus prepared by the solicitors without investigation, but trusted that they would not state anything which was not right. I do not think that is a reasonable ground for making a statement which, if he had inquired into it, he would have found not to be a correct and true statement, and if he had looked at the Act (and he must be taken to have known the provisions of the Act) he would have found a section which would not have required the legal advice of the solicitors as to what its true construction was, but clearly stating that the company had only the right at the present moment to use horse power or animal power, and that they would not get the right to use steam power unless something further was obtained—namely, the consent of the Board of Trade.

Some of the defendants do not appear to have troubled themselves about the matter, but they cannot be in a better position than Mr. Moore, and one of them who does say that he thought the consent had been obtained, does not state any sufficient reason for believing that, when he was going to make such a statement as this to the public to take shares.

I have already referred to the view which I understand to have been taken by Stirling, J., with regard to the reasonable ground for the directors supposing the statement to be true. It was that they had reasonable ground, as men of business, for believing that in fact this consent of the Board of Trade would be obtained. I think if it turned upon that alone I should agree with him. Probably they did expect it, although some of them afterwards thought it would not be desirable that steam power should be employed upon the line. I do not rely upon that. But although I think that the directors believed that the Board of Trade would probably give their consent, that does not make true the statement which, in fact, they made. A very little alteration in the statement—one feels that—would have made it true in fact; for instance, if they had only said, "Subject to the consent of the Board of Trade," and then it could not have been said that by any misstatement on their part the plaintiff had been induced to take the shares.

The next point we have to consider is whether the plaintiff was induced by this statement to take the shares. I think it is necessary here to state a further point of law. As I understand the law, it is not necessary that the misstatement should be the motive, in the sense of the only motive, the only inducement, to the party who has acted to his prejudice so to act. It is quite sufficient if the statement is a material inducement to the party to act upon it. Of course it would be almost impossible to say it was the only inducement. There must be so many matters which enter into a man's mind in considering whether or no he shall take shares or whether he shall do any similar act. But in my opinion (and I do not refer to the dicta of various judges which have been to the same effect) it is quite sufficient if it was a material inducement to the party who has suffered loss to take the shares. I think Stirling, J., came to the conclusion that the misstatement was a material inducement to the plaintiff to take the shares, because he says in his judgment that the plaintiff saw this and was of opinion that having steam power would add very materially to the profits of the company. But I think the conclusion he came to was this—that the statement was made an untrue one by the non-statement that the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary before the power could be acquired. I think he came to the conclusion that if that had been mentioned it would not have affected the plaintiff or prevented him taking the shares. Why does he do that? The plaintiff stated that if that clause had been recited in the prospectus and given in extenso in the prospectus he would not have read it.

The question for our consideration in that event would be totally different from what we have to consider now, and that would be a very different prospectus from the prospectus which we have before us, where there is no statement at all of the clause of the Act, and nothing but this statement, which anyone to whom the prospectus was shown was at liberty to take and read in that which, in my opinion, is its proper meaning construed fairly.

I think Stirling, J., also considered that the plaintiff was to some extent careless in reading the prospectus, but he says that he relies on the evidence given by the plaintiff, and that he gave his evidence with great fairness, not wishing or intending or trying to exaggerate matters. I cannot, on this point, agree with the inference the learned judge drew from the facts stated by the plaintiff. [His lordship then referred further to the evidence, and continued.]

There is only one other point which we ought to refer to in differing from Stirling, J—that is, his reliance on the conduct of the plaintiff at the meeting in November, 1884. No doubt that was a material point, and it struck me as one to some extent in favour of the defendants. They say "How was it, if the plaintiff thought he had been deceived by a misstatement made by these defendants, that at that meeting, when he knew that they had not the sanction of the Board of Trade, that he expressed himself as he did as having full confidence in the directors?" Undoubtedly he could not after his action at that meeting have set aside the contract to take the shares. But it is a different question here. It is a question as to whether he has precluded himself from bringing this action against the directors. He has not precluded himself, but his conduct there was fairly used as an argument that that would show that he had not considered himself in any way deceived. But we must remember that at that time there was a prospect that the directors would get the sanction of the Board of Trade, and I think the plaintiff might reasonably, even if he considered himself deceived, express his confidence in the management of the directors, and that they were going to do their best for the company and to get this power from the Board of Trade, and he might wish to support them so as to give them a better chance of enabling them to get that. I do not think that Stirling, J., relied upon the plaintiff's conduct at that meeting as showing that the statement of the plaintiff, that he relied on the statement in the sense in which I think it ought to be read, could not be believed. And I think his conduct at that meeting may well be explained, and probably is attributable to the circumstances to which I have referred, and that it did not show that he did not believe or rely upon the statement or at that time think that he had been deceived by the directors. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff here has made out his case. There is one other matter which was pressed upon us to which I ought to refer—that the collapse of the company was not in any way caused by the want of a right to use steam power. But the question we have to consider is not the cause of the failure of the company, but whether, in reliance on the statements made by the defendants which were incorrect, the plaintiff has done an act to his prejudice.

That being so, the defendants must be held liable. It is not that I attribute to them any intention to commit fraud, but they have made a statement which was incorrect to induce the plaintiff to act upon it without any sufficient reason for making that statement, without any sufficient reason for believing it to be true. Therefore they are liable. Then what ought the judgment to be?

It is said on the part of the defendants that the plaintiff has not made out what the loss is. Well, he has made out a primâ facie case—that is to say, he has shown I think, on the evidence, that the shares are of very much less value than the sum which he gave for them. He gave £4,000, and on the evidence the company is being wound up. I think the proper course will be to declare that the plaintiff was induced by a misstatement in the prospectus to take the shares, and that the defendants are liable, under the circumstances, for any loss which he has sustained by taking the shares, and that there must be an inquiry as to what that is.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I entirely agree in the judgment which has been delivered by Cotton, L.J., and particularly with his statement of the law with which he commenced that judgment; but I will add my own statement to the principle, which, I believe, does not materially differ from his. I take the law to be that if a man takes upon himself to assert a thing to be true which he does not know to be true, and has no reasonable ground to believe to be true, in order to induce another to act upon the assertion, who does so act, and is thereby damnified, the person so damnified is entitled to maintain an action for deceit.

Having so stated the principle, I will proceed to consider the various questions which arise in this case, and it will be convenient to do so in the order Stirling, J., has dealt with them.

The first question is, supposing that the plaintiff is entitled to recover at all, who are the persons responsible? Well, no serious question has been raised with regard to anyone but the defendant Derry, and with regard to him it has been said that this prospectus which is complained of was, in the first place, issued without his having seen it, and therefore he cannot be responsible for it. But it appears that it was prepared in consequence of an authority given by him that a prospectus should be prepared upon the basis of the former; and it appears to be the fact that before the plaintiff did anything in consequence of his having received this prospectus it was communicated to Mr. Derry, and of course the question would be whether or not he sanctioned and approved that prospectus. It appears to me the evidence is quite conclusive that he did. In order to judge of that we may look at his subsequent conduct. He made no objection to this prospectus, and he made use of it by circulating it amongst his friends. I think, therefore, that he adopted it, and is therefore responsible for any mischief which may have arisen from its circulation; and, in fact, that was the conclusion which Stirling, J., arrived at, and our judgment, therefore, is in accordance with the opinion of Stirling, J.

Now the next question is whether the statement contained in that prospectus was true. It has been contended on behalf of some of the defendants boldly that it is; but I confess I am quite unable to understand how that can be successfully maintained. I must read again the passage which is chiefly relied on. [His lordship read it, and continued:—] It is to be noted that so much importance is attached to this that it is printed in capitals to attract the attention of readers, and obviously to influence their minds by this positive statement.

Now it has not been, and cannot be, contended that there was any such absolute right. It was only a right in the event of the Board of Trade approving of the use of steam upon the line. If it had been truly stated it would have been only that they had an expectation of obtaining the power to use steam or other mechanical motive power. But upon this point the judgment of Stirling, J., is against the defendants, (I am now only upon the question whether or not it is a true statement), for he says:—"First of all, is this statement in the prospectus true or untrue? To my mind it is perfectly clear that it is not an accurate statement of the legal position of the company," and in that I entirely concur, and I am unable to see how it was possible to argue that it was a correct statement.

Then arises that which is the main question in this cause, Whether or not this statement, which Stirling, J., calls inaccurate, is one made under such circumstances as to make the defendants responsible for the consequences of other persons having acted upon it? Now Stirling, J., says that perhaps the law on this point is not quite settled yet, and he refers, as well illustrating the point upon which differences have arisen, and may remain to be settled, to two judgments, the one of Lord Chelmsford and the other of Lord Cranworth, in the Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie. I will not read the judgment of Lord Chelmsford, because it appears to me that that supports the principle which I have ventured to say appears to me to be the correct one. I only wish to call attention to the language of Lord Cranworth, which is supposed to indicate a different opinion on his part. He says: "If persons in the situation of directors of a bank make statements as to the condition of its affairs which they bonâ fide believe to be true, I cannot think they can be guilty of fraud because other persons think, or the court thinks, or your lordships think, that there was no sufficient ground to warrant the opinion which they have formed." Now I think that if it is a matter of opinion, then there is of course ample room for the question whether or not that opinion was reasonably formed. But if it is a question of fact very different considerations arise. It appears to me that this is a question of fact. Can anybody reading this section come to any other conclusion than that which Stirling, J., himself has come to, that the prospectus does not correctly set forth the substance of the Act? Now there have been numerous authorities which have been referred to in which, as I conceive, the principle which I have stated has been enunciated by judges of great eminence. There is the statement of the law by Lord Cairns in the Reese River Silver Mining Co. v. Smith, 17 W. R. 1046, L. R. 4 H. L. 64, in which he says, at p. 79, "When I say a 'fraud,' I do not enter into any question with regard to the imputation of what may be called fraud in the more invidious sense against the directors. I think it may be quite possible, as has been alleged, that they were ignorant of the untruth of the statements made in their prospectus. But I apprehend it to be the rule of law that, if persons take upon themselves to make assertions as to which they are ignorant whether they are true or untrue, they must, in a civil point of view, be held as responsible as if they had asserted that which they knew to be untrue." And Lord Cairns expresses himself to a similar effect in the case of Peek v. Gurney. But it has been said that these passages relate to actions for the rescission of contracts, and not to actions for deceit. But I will first add to this opinion of Lord Cairns the statement of the law by Maule, J., in the case of Evans v. Edmunds, 1 W. R. 412, 13 C. B. 787: "If a man having no knowledge whatever on the subject takes upon himself to represent a certain state of facts to exist, he does so at his own peril, and if it is done either with a view to secure some benefit to himself or to deceive a third person, he is guilty of fraud, for he takes upon himself to warrant his own belief of the truth of that which he asserts." I agree with what is said in these two opinions, the one of Maule, J., and the other of Lord Cairns, and also with what is said by Mr. Pollock in his valuable work on Torts, at p. 245, "that these dicta, one of an eminent common law judge, the other of an eminent Chancellor, are now both classical," and that their application extends to actions for deceit as well as to actions for the rescission of contracts. I may add the very clear opinion of the late Master of the Rolls in an action for deceit—namely, that of Smith v. Chadwick—in which he laid down the law, as I think, precisely as it has been laid down by Cotton, L.J.: "Now without repeating at full length what I have said in the recent case, I think the law on this subject is clear. A man may issue a prospectus or make any other statement to induce another to enter into a contract believing that his statement is true and not intending to deceive, but he may, through carelessness, have made statements which are not true, and if he does so he is liable in an action of deceit; he cannot be allowed to escape merely because he had good intentions and did not intend to defraud."

But reliance has been placed upon some observations of Lord Bramwell, expressed in his usual striking manner, and certainly I am very unwilling to enter into any discussion with so great a master of language as Lord Bramwell. But I must venture to express my opinion that the expression "legal fraud" which has been in constant use by judges for very many years is, to say the least, an exceedingly convenient expression—that is to say, it is an expression which very clearly conveys an idea which is the object of language, and it appears to me to mean this, that degree of moral culpability in the statement of an untruth to induce another to alter his position to which the law attaches responsibility. And that is, as I think, where a man makes an untrue statement for the purpose mentioned without reasonable cause for believing it to be true. No doubt the word "fraud" is, in common parlance, reserved for actions of great turpitude, but the law applies it to lesser breaches of moral duty; and it appears to me that the making of any statement from which others are intended to act without reasonable ground for stating it, and without reasonable ground for believing it to be true, is a breach of moral duty, though it may not be one of such dark complexion as to blast for ever the character of the man who does it. It is not necessary that there should be that amount of wrong in order to give a legal remedy. And I think the same observations apply to Bowen, L.J.'s use of the word "dishonesty," though, as Cotton, L.J., has pointed out, when we come to read the whole of his judgment we see in what sense he uses the word "dishonesty," as something implying moral culpability.

Applying these principles to the present case, I confess I cannot bring myself to think that any man reading this section of the Act of Parliament would believe that the prospectus correctly or truly set forth the powers of the company in respect of the right to use steam; in other words, I am unable to see that the directors had any reasonable ground for believing that statement to be true.

But Stirling, J., has considered the case from this point of view: of whether they had reasonable ground for believing that which they said. He does not put it upon the point of whether or not they were guilty of this grosser kind of fraud, but he considers the case upon the basis of its being actionable to make a statement without reasonable ground for believing it to be true; and he comes to the conclusion that in this case they had such reasonable grounds. And now we must consider upon what he bases his judgment. After making some severe comments upon four of the defendants for taking the money to qualify them, in considering whether these defendants are guilty of anything blameworthy, he says that if it had been said to them, "You have told a thing in the prospectus which you have no right to tell; you have said you have a right to use mechanical power when you have not; each and every one of them would have stood aghast." It is very likely that they did stand aghast when they heard their conduct with regard to accepting the money so described by Stirling, J. But that does not affect the justice of his remarks with regard to their conduct; and their liability at law is not to be measured by the surprise that they would feel when it is pointed out to them that they are liable to an action. That would lead to very dangerous consequences, for then persons in the position of the defendants would be at liberty to deceive others to the extent that they could succeed in deceiving themselves.

But Stirling, J., then proceeds to deal with the facts. His judgment seem to amount to this, that because there was a possibility of the sanction of the Board of Trade being obtained, and the defendants believed it would be obtained as a matter of course, and that therefore they should obtain that sanction in the future, that that constituted reasonable ground for stating that they have it in the present. I can only say with great regret that I entirely differ from that view. It appears to me that nothing can morally justify a man in stating a thing as a fact as existing at present because he expects that it will exist in the future. And when Stirling, J., says that mercantile men dealing with matters of business would be the first to cry out if the notion of deceit were extended to what is honestly done in the belief that these things would come about, I can only say that there are two classes of mercantile men. There are those who have lax notions of the duty of taking care to be accurate, and those who are scrupulously careful to observe this duty; and it is the opinion of the latter class to which I attach most importance.

The next question is whether or not this statement, untrue in fact, and, as I think, made without reasonable ground for believing it to be true, by the defendants influenced the plaintiff in taking these shares. Now upon this point we do not differ from the opinion expressed by Stirling, J., for he says that his conclusion upon the evidence is: "I think that the existence of this paragraph had a material influence upon the mind of Sir Henry Peek when he applied for the shares." In my judgment, so far as this part of the case is concerned, that carries the case for the plaintiff. That which materially influences a man in taking a step, subject to the observations as to the breach of moral duty on the part of those who make it, gives a cause of action. It is not necessary that it should be the sole influencing motive. If it was a motive materially influencing, then, unless it had been present, the conduct of the plaintiff might have been different, which is sufficient. But Stirling, J., seems to think that though the existence of the paragraph had a material influence upon the mind of Sir Henry Peek when he applied for the shares, that that is in a degree modified by the circumstance that Sir Henry Peek does not state that had he known the contents of the Act he would not have applied for the shares. I am of opinion that a hypothetical question of that kind is not material in considering this question. No one could tell what he would have done under other circumstances. The ground of complaint is: "I had not the opportunity of exercising my judgment." And therefore it seems to me that the case is made out that Sir Henry Peek was materially influenced so that for this purpose he was induced to take the shares by reason of this false statement.

Then there remains only the question of damages. Upon that I have nothing to add to what has been said by Cotton, L.J.

LOPES, L.J.—This case is a case of such importance that I desire to state my view of the law, although I in no way differ from the law as it has been stated, nor from the result arrived at. Now this is an action of deceit. It is true that there are different degrees of moral delinquency, but I know of no fraud which will support an action of deceit to which some moral delinquency does not belong. An action for deceit would not lie for an innocent misrepresentation, for such misrepresentation is not fraudulent. On the other hand, a slight degree of what I will call moral obliquity will suffice to render a misrepresentation fraudulent in contemplation of law. And let me say this is what I understand by the expression which is so often used in the authorities, and which has been referred to by Sir James Hannen, I mean the expression "legal fraud." Now I will endeavour shortly to state what I believe the result of the cases. The law, I venture to say, is well settled and well understood. I think the result of the cases amounts to this. If a person makes to another a material and definite statement of fact which is false, intending that person to rely upon it, and he does rely upon it and is thereby damaged, then the person making the statement is liable to make compensation to the person to whom it is made—first, if it is false to the knowledge of the persom making it; secondly, if it is untrue in fact, and not believed to be true by the person making it; thirdly, if it is untrue in fact, and is made recklessly, for instance, without any knowledge on the subject and without taking the trouble to ascertain if it is true or false; fourthly, if it is untrue in fact but believed to be true, but without any reasonable grounds for such belief. I believe that to be a fair statement of what the result of the cases is.

I will now proceed to deal with this case, and to apply those principles to this case, and I shall endeavour to do that very shortly.

First, with regard to the responsibility of the defendants, I will deal with that matter first. I think they are all responsible for this prospectus. A distinction has been endeavoured to be made in the case of Mr. Derry. I think there is no distinction that can be relied upon. When it is recollected that 100 of the prospectuses were sent to him and that he issued them, and it must be assumed read them, I think the fair conclusion is that he adopted that prospectus. Passing from that, the question arises, which, to my mind, is a most material one, as to what is the meaning of that statement in the prospectus. Now there are three passages in the prospectus (I think only two have been mentioned hitherto, but I think there are three) which are important. On the first page there are the words "Incorporated by special Act of Parliament 45 & 46 Vict., authorizing the use of steam or other mechanical motive power." Then there is the passage in the middle of the prospectus, portions of which are in capital letters and intended to be emphatic, in these words. [His lordship read it, and continued:—] And then there is a further passage which I think is not unimportant lower down in the prospectus, which is in these words: "Looking at the exceptional advantages offered by this undertaking from the dense population of the towns it traverses, the unusually favourable conditions as to motive power open to the company, and the annual dividends earned by other tramways which do not enjoy such special privileges"—I presume referring to the steam power—"the directors have reason to believe that the enterprize will prove highly remunerative, and the shares now for subscription offer a very favourable opportunity for a sound and progressive investment." Now those are the words in the prospectus which are relied upon by the plaintiff. Now what is the test we ought to apply in order to ascertain the meaning of those words? I think the proper test is to determine as far as we can how a reader of ordinary intelligence reading that prospectus would understand those statements. I come to the conclusion that a reader of ordinary intelligence would understand that in that prospectus was contained a definite assertion of a then existing fact—that is, a right to use steam power. I cannot think that any reader of ordinary intelligence reading those passages would come to the conclusion that it meant only an assertion of what I will call a violent probability that a consent to use steam power would be obtained.

If that is the meaning, then the question arises, Was it a false statement? It seems to me that that is a matter which cannot be contested, and which, in point of fact, was not contested. It is perfectly clear, by reference to the special Act, that no steam power could be used without the consent of the Board of Trade and the two corporations of Plymouth and Devonport.

Now, passing from that, did the defendants intend the plaintiff to act upon that statement? That, again, I say, is too clear for argument, and Stirling, J., did not doubt it; I think he could hardly doubt it.

But now I come to one of the two most important matters in this case. Was that statement, having the meaning which I think belongs to it, fraudulent? If the law is correct as I have stated it, it would be fraudulent if it was made recklessly, or if it was made without any knowledge of the subject one way or another, or if it was believed in by those who made it but without any reasonable grounds for such belief. The defendants, then, appear to me to be in this dilemma. If they say they had no knowledge of the subject, whether it was accurate or not, then surely it must be a reckless statement on their part. If, on the other hand, they say, "We believed in it," they must go further, and they must say, "We had reasonable grounds for believing it," because, if it was believed in, but without reasonable grounds, then it would be fraudulent. Now how could they possibly say they had reasonable grounds for believing that that statement was accurate? They had their own Act of Parliament. If they had referred to it they would at once have seen that the statement was absolutely incorrect. Therefore it appears to me that they must either have been reckless, and this was a statement recklessly made, or, if it was a statement believed in, that it was a statement made without any reasonable ground for believing it. It will not do for them to say, as I rather think Stirling, J., if I understand his judgment correctly, thought it would do, "We had reasonable grounds for saying that we expected that the power should be given us."

Now, with regard to this part of the case, it appears to me that that passage which was read by Sir J. Hannen from the judgment of Sir George Jessel, late Master of the Rolls, in Smith v. Chadwick is very applicable. [His lordship read it, and continued:—] It appears to me that these words cover this portion of the case.

Now, passing from that, I come to the next question, Did the plaintiff rely on that statement? or, in other words, Was he induced to take shares by means of that statement? Now the statement need not be the only motive which induced him to take the shares. It would be quite sufficient if that statement materially influenced his mind in taking those shares; and Stirling, J., seems to have come to the conclusion that it did, because he says, "I think the statement materially influenced the plaintiff's mind." I quite agree with what was said by Sir J. Hannen, that, so far as this portion of the case is concerned, I think that concluded it. But that was not the view of Stirling, J. There was a portion of the judgment in Smith v. Chadwick which here again becomes valuable. The Master of the Rolls again goes on to say, "Again, on the question of the materiality of the statement, if the court sees, on the face of it, that it is of such a nature as would induce a person to enter into the contract, or would tend to induce him to do so, or that it would be a part of the inducement to enter into the contract, the inference is if he entered into the contract that he acted on the inducement so held out, and you want no evidence that he did so act; but even then you may show" (he goes on to say) "other circumstances which rebut that." Therefore, assuming the conclusions to which I have arrived with regard to the rest of the case are correct, there is here an inference that he did act upon the statement. Now Stirling, J.'s judgment seems to have been influenced by several matters to which he alludes. It is to be recollected that he gives Sir H. Peek, the plaintiff, every credit for candour and truthfulness. In one part of his judgment he speaks with regard to a defect in his memory—that is, with regard to the signature to a certain application for shares. I cannot think that that was very material, and I think an explanation was given of it which is satisfactory. But what we have to look at is what the result of the whole of the evidence given by him is. He need not have been called at all. The inference, I take it, would have been sufficient if it had been left there. But he is called and a certain question is put to him by Mr. Bompas which, I am rather inclined to think, Sir Henry Peek somewhat misunderstood, and the answer to which, I think, Stirling, J., attached too much importance to. When that question was put to Sir H. Peek his mind was directed to that portion of it which related to the seven years, and, as I observed in the course of the argument, if the question had been put in a different form—namely, in this form, "If there had appeared, on that statement and assertion, that this right to use steam motive power was subject to the consent of the Board of Trade," I do not hesitate to say, having regard to the rest of his evidence and the general result of his evidence, that I believe he would have unreservedly have said, "I should not, in those circumstances, have taken the shares."

Then, again, there is another matter which I will only shortly allude to, and that is this. Stirling, J.'s mind seems to have been affected by what took place at the meeting in November, 1884, when I think Sir Henry Peek says he had confidence in the direction, or used some words to that effect, but then, as Mr. Bompas has reminded us, it must be borne in mind that at that time there was a prospect still existing of getting this consent from the board. I think the explanation of what Sir Henry Peek said at that meeting is this: "Well, I do not desire, by anything I may say, in any way to embarrass or hamper the directors. It is possible they may get this consent in the future, and I will do nothing which shall in any way prejudice their so doing."

I think that disposes of all the matters in the case except the question of damages. I quite agree with what has been said in respect to damages.

The appeal stood over for argument upon the question of the measure of damages.

The following cases were referred to on this point:—Twycross v. Grant, 25 W. R. 701, 2 C. P. D. 469, 568; Davidson v. Tulloch, 8 W. R. 309, 3 Macq. 783; Brown v. Muller, 21 W. R. 18, L. R. 7 Ex. 319; Arkwright v.

Newbold, 29 W. R. 455, 17 Ch. D. 301; Waddell v. Blockey, 27 W. R. 931, 4 Q. B. D. 678; Hamer v. James, 2 Times Law Rep. 852.

COTTON, L.J.—One rather difficult point has been omitted in the argument, and naturally, because neither party knew what would be the result of our opinion on the question whether the defendants had made any representation which entitled the plaintiff to relief; and we have had a long and exhaustive argument to-day on the question. It is one of considerable difficulty. The question which arose was this—there being no evidence which would really fix the loss, we thought there ought to be an inquiry, but the question was from what period ought that inquiry to be directed, whether the value of the shares ought to be estimated at the time when the action was brought or at the present time? But I think, on the whole, after the discussion we have had, that on principle and in accordance with the cases neither of those periods can be fixed.

The damage to be recovered by the plaintiff is the loss which he sustained by acting on the representations of the defendants. That acting was taking the shares. Before he was induced to buy the shares he had the £4,000 in his pocket. The day when the shares were allotted to him, which was the consequence of his acting, he paid over that £4,000 and he got the shares; and the loss sustained by him in consequence of his acting on the representations of the defendants was having the shares instead of having in his pocket the £4,000. The loss, therefore, must be the difference between his £4,000 and the then value of the shares.

Now it must not be taken that the value of the shares was what they would have sold for in the market, because that might not show the real value at all. I do not know whether there was any market in the case, but the market might have been affected by the representations which were made by the defendants which induced the plaintiff to act and which might have induced others to act. Neither can the plaintiff get the benefit of any loss or depreciation in the shares which was occasioned by subsequent acts. If the company at the time was a good company, and one which was of intrinsic value, then no fact which subsequently occurred—as, for instance, some Act of Parliament being passed entirely to prevent such tramways from having steam used upon them or anything else—ought to add to the damages to be paid by the defendants, because the value of the shares at the time, under the circumstances then existing, is that which must be taken into account in considering what the plaintiff lost by handing over his £4,000 and getting his shares. Of course a plaintiff cannot aggravate the damages he is to get by acting unreasonably; and if here the plaintiff had in any way acted unreasonably then any loss which was the consequence of that would not be added to the damages which were to be paid by the defendants. But I cannot think that he acted unreasonably. The only time when it could be said he acted unreasonably was when he discovered the fraud. The point which occurred to me was whether he ought not then to have at once repudiated the shares, to have brought an action against the company to compel them to take back the shares and get back his £4,000; but I cannot think that he can be considered as having acted unreasonably in that matter. He did commence an action in order to set aside the purchase from the company, but that was prevented from being effectual because the winding-up petition was presented two days before. I do not think we can say that his conduct was so unreasonable as to deprive him of any action against the defendants here, or from taking into account the subsequent events. Although the value is not to be ascertained at the subsequent period so as to take into account for the benefit of the plaintiff events subsequent, which depreciated the value of this company, yet those events, if they show that the company was originally, with the capital which it had got, a company which was worthless, may, in my opinion, be taken into account as evidence of what was the value immediately after the shares were allotted to the plaintiff. So that it may be that, useful as this discussion has been in order to elucidate what ought to be the proper time for ascertaining the value, it may ultimately produce no good result to the defendant. But I think it is in accordance with the cases, and in accordance with principle, that the real value, and not the market value, is to be ascertained immediately after the day when the shares were allotted to the plaintiff. That is the rule laid down by Lord Cranworth in Davidson v. Tulloch. That was a case of suing for deceit in which the person whose personal representatives the plaintiffs were was induced to take shares by misrepresentation. Lord Cranworth says: "The proper mode of measuring the damages is to ascertain the difference between the purchase-money and what would have been a fair price to be paid for the shares in the circumstances of the company at the time of the purchase, and that may be made the measure of damages if a trial should take place." There was a future trial to be held, because I think nothing was really decided there except laying down what the principle was. That is in accordance with what was laid down by Fry, L.J., in Arkwright v. Newbold, and I think is really in accordance with the decision of the majority of the judges in Twycross v. Grant, because all their judgments proceeded on the footing that at the time the shares were bought the company was utterly worthless. What was said by Lord Bramwell is very important, because he states his opinion that it cannot be unreasonable for a purchaser not to sell. Of course, if he sells, whatever he gets he must bring into account; but he does lay down in various ways that it is not unreasonable for a purchaser not to sell so as to preclude him from getting as damages the difference between the price that he paid and what was in fact the actual value of the shares at the time when he was induced to purchase.

In my opinion, therefore, although events injurious to the company which occurred, not from intrinsic defects in it, but from causes arising after the purchase, cannot be taken into account if there is no better evidence of the result of the winding up of the company—the sum which can be returned to the shareholders may be taken into account. In my opinion the way of fixing the loss is to take the real value of the shares the day after they were allotted to the plaintiff.

SIR JAMES HANNEN.—I will only add a few words. I will endeavour to put the case in my own words, though I believe I do not differ in the slightest degree from what Cotton, L.J., has said. The question is, How much worse off is the plaintiff than if he had not bought the shares? If he had not bought the shares he would have had his £4,000 in his pocket. To ascertain his loss we must deduct from that amount the real value of the things he got. That must be ascertained by the light of the events which have happened down to the time of the inquiry. It is not what the shares might have been sold for, because he was not bound to sell them, and subsequent events may show that what the shares might have been sold for was not their true value, but a mistaken estimate of their value; and to follow up the simile of the horse which has been introduced into this case, as it has so often been introduced into these cases, it may be said that, if a man by means of a misrepresentation, bought a horse which had the seeds of mortal disease in it, it was of no value except the hide; but if it perished from a subsequent accident, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover the value.

LOPES, L.J.—The question in this case is, What is the loss the plaintiff has sustained by acting on the misrepresentation of the defendants, and what is the true measure of his damage? In my opinion it is the difference between the £4,000 he paid and the real value of the shares immediately after the shares were allotted. Any damage occurring after the discovery of the fraud when the plaintiff might have rescinded the contract, and which would not be attributable to his acting on the misrepresentation, but to other causes, in my opinion, would not be recoverable.

Bill of sale—Affidavit—Omission of residence and occupation of attesting witness—Register—Power to order rectification—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 10, 12, 14.

Under section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, a judge has power to rectify accidental omissions in the register of bills of sale.

Held, affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 669, 20 Q. B. D. 535), that he has no power under this section to order an affidavit to be filed to supply particulars inadvertently omitted in the affidavit filed with the registrar.

The power given by section 14 of extending the time for registration will not be exercised after the title to the goods has actually vested in an execution creditor who has seized them.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ.), reported ante, p. 669, 20 Q. B. D. 535.

Section 10 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, provides that a bill of sale shall be attested and registered by the bill of sale and a true copy thereof, together with an affidavit of the time of its being made, and of its due execution and attestation, and a description of the residence and occupation of the person making or giving the bill, and of every attesting witness to it, being duly filed with the registrar within seven days of the making of the bill of sale.

By section 12, "The registrar shall keep a book—in this Act called 'the register'—for the purposes of this Act, and shall, upon the filing of any bill of sale or copy under this Act, enter therein . . . the name, residence, and occupation of the person by whom the bill was made or given, and the other particulars . . . . prescribed under this Act.

By section 14, "Any judge of the High Court, on being satisfied that the omission to register a bill of sale or an affidavit of the renewal thereof within the time prescribed by the Act, or the omission or misstatement of the name, residence, or occupation of any person was accidental or due to inadvertence, may, in his discretion, order such omission or misstatement to be rectified by the insertion in the register of the true name, residence, or occupation, or by extending the time for such registration upon such terms and conditions (if any) as to security . . . or otherwise . . . as he thinks fit to direct."

At the trial of an interpleader issue at chambers to try the right to goods taken in execution by the plaintiff under a judgment and claimed by the claimant under a bill of sale, Field, J., being of opinion that the residence and occupation of one of the attesting witnesses to the bill of sale had been inadvertently omitted from the affidavit filed with the registrar, ordered a supplemental affidavit to be filed setting out these particulars.

The Divisional Court set this order aside as being made without jurisdiction, and the claimant appealed.

Bassett Hopkins, for the claimant.—The order of Field, J., was right. Mere inadvertence will not be allowed to invalidate a bill of sale. Even if there is no power to rectify the affidavit, the court has power, under section 14, to extend the time for registration.

Kisch, for the execution creditor.—The judge has power to rectify the register as defined by section 12, but has no power to order a supplemental affidavit to be filed. It is too late now to extend the time for registration.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—BOWEN, L.J.—By the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, it is provided that, for the purpose of the registration of every bill of sale, an affidavit must be filed describing the residence and occupation of each of the attesting witnesses to the bill of sale. In the affidavit which was filed in this case the residence and occupation of one of the witnesses were inadvertently omitted. To cure what was an evident slip Field, J., ordered a supplemental affidavit to be filed under section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. From this order there was an appeal to the Divisional Court, who have set it aside, on the ground that section 14 only refers to the rectification of the register, and does not give power to order such a supplementary affidavit to be filed. The register is defined in section 12, and I am clearly of opinion that the view taken by the Divisional Court was the correct one, and that the order of Field, J., was without authority. On the appeal to us, however, a further point was raised—namely, that we had power, under the latter part of section 14, to extend, even at the eleventh hour, the time for registration. I think it is a hard case, and that if we could accede to this suggestion we would do so. But the Act of Parliament which enables an extension of time to be granted never intended, as I think, that it should be granted after the title to the goods seized had actually vested in the execution creditor. Under section 8, the execution creditor having seized, the title to the goods vested in him, and the Legislature could not, I think, have intended that we should so extend the time as to defeat a title which had actually vested in a bonâ fide person. Such an exercise of our discretion could not be justified. Therefore we are reluctantly compelled to come to the same conclusion as the Divisional Court, that the order of Field, J., was not justified, and must be set aside.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

In re NEW CHILE GOLD MINING CO. (a.)

Company—Reduction of capital—Confirmation by the court—Capital lost or unrepresented by available assets—Issue of shares at a discount—Voluntary liquidation—Sale of property of old company in consideration of shares in new company—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 161—Companies Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), ss. 3, 4.

In pursuance of a special resolution passed by a company in liquidation the liquidator agreed to sell the property of the company to a new company, part of the consideration being the issue to each shareholder of the old company of one share of £1 in the new company, with 15s. credited as paid up thereon, in exchange for each fully paid-up share of £1 in the old company held by such shareholder, and that the remaining 5s. per share should be payable by the allottee in the manner provided by the agreement. The whole of the shares in the new company were issued to shareholders in the old company as provided by the agreement, prior to which a contract providing for their being issued in that manner was filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies. The remaining 5s. per share was afterwards paid up on all the shares. The capital of the company was afterwards increased by a sum of £500,000, divided into 500,000 shares of £1 each, of which 50,000 were issued as fully paid up as the consideration for the purchase of other property by the company.

The company afterwards passed a special resolution for reducing the capital by cancelling paid-up capital to the extent of 15s. per share, as having been lost or being unrepresented by available assets.

Upon a petition for the confirmation of the resolution by the court, Held, that the issue of the shares at a discount was illegal, and that the shareholders were still liable to the extent of 15s. per share; consequently the proposed reduction could not be confirmed by the court.

Petition.

The New Chile Gold Mining Co. (Limited) was incorporated on the 20th of November, 1884, under the Companies Act, 1862, for the purpose of acquiring the property of a company called the Chile Gold Mining Co. (Limited) (hereafter referred to as the old company), which was then in voluntary liquidation under an extraordinary resolution passed on the 18th of November, 1884, and other mining property in Venezuela, and working the same. The capital of the new company was £500,000, divided into 500,000 shares of £1 each. By the articles of association the company was authorized at any time to reduce its capital. Special resolutions were passed by the old company, under the provisions of section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, authorizing the liquidator to transfer or sell all or any of the assets of the company to any other company formed or to be formed, and to receive in compensation or part compensation for such transfer or sale, shares or other interests in any such other company.

By a deed dated the 3rd of December, 1884, and made between the old company and their liquidator of the one part, and the new company of the other part, the old company agreed, as beneficial owners, to sell and convey to the new company, and the new company agreed to purchase and accept as from the 3rd of December, 1884, the undertaking, mines, and property of the old company, free from incumbrances, save and except the charges created by the indentures of mortgage executed to secure certain debentures which had been issued by the old company, and it was agreed that the new company should, on or before the 1st of March, 1885, pay to the old company a sum sufficient to enable the liquidator to pay and discharge all the debts and liabilities thereof, including any liability to dissentient members under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, but not including the debentures, or should otherwise satisfy and discharge all such debts and liabilities, and should further pay and discharge all the costs, charges, and expenses of and incident to the winding up of the old company; that the new company should take over and indemnify the old company against all liability in respect of the debentures and mortgage deeds, and that the new company should, if and when required to do so by the liquidator of the old company, allot and issue to each shareholder of the old company one share of £1 in the new company, with 15s. credited as paid up thereon, in exchange for each fully paid-up share of £1 in the old company held by such shareholder, and that the remaining 5s. per share upon each of such shares in the new company should be payable by the allottee or transferee thereof as to 1s. per share on the 6th of December, 1884, and as to the remaining 4s. per share as and when called up by the board of directors of the new company.

The whole of the 500,000 shares in the new company were issued to shareholders in the old company as provided by the agreement, with 15s. per share credited as paid up thereon, and the remaining 5s. per share was afterwards paid up on all the shares.

Prior to the issue of these shares a contract dated the 3rd of December, 1884, between the old company and their liquidator of the one part, and the new company of the other part, providing for the issue of the shares with 15s. per share credited as paid up thereon in the manner above mentioned, was filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies in accordance with the provisions of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

In 1885 a special resolution was passed increasing the capital of the new company by a sum of £100,000 divided into 100,000 shares of £1 each. Of these shares 50,000 were issued as fully paid up in respect of the purchase by the company of certain mining property, under a contract dated the 28th of July, 1885, which, before the issue of shares, was filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies. These 50,000 fully paid-up shares were originally represented by share warrants to bearer, 17,500 of these warrants were afterwards redelivered to the company, and the remaining 32,500 were still outstanding. The remaining 50,000 shares of the 100,000 were issued as paid up to the extent of 19s. per share, in pursuance of two contracts dated the 11th of November and the 13th of December, 1886, in consideration of a sum of £12,500, being 4s. per share, paid by the allottees to the company in respect of those shares. Both these contracts were filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies prior to the issue of the shares. The remaining 1s. per share was afterwards paid up on the 50,000 shares.

In 1887 a special resolution was passed increasing the capital by £400,000 in 400,000 shares of £1 each. Of these shares 190,000 were issued at a discount of 15s. per share, in pursuance of contracts filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies prior to the issue of the shares. The remaining 5s. per share were afterwards paid up on all these shares. The remaining 210,000 shares had not been issued. By a special resolution of the company, passed in March, 1888, it was resolved "that the capital of the company be reduced by £750,000 by cancelling paid-up capital which has been lost, or is unrepresented by available assets, to the extent of 15s. per share upon each of the 1,000,000 shares which have been issued or authorized to be issued."

The company presented this petition asking that the special resolution for the reduction of capital might be confirmed by the court.

It appeared from the statements in the petition that previously to the passing of the special resolution paid-up capital to the extent of £592,500 had been lost or was unrepresented by available assets, and that the proposed reduction of capital did not involve either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital, or the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital.

The petition was not served on anyone.

North, J.—I cannot make any order on the petition, and I must dismiss it. It is based on this, that the shares were issued to the shareholders with 15s. per share paid up thereon, and 5s. per share which remained to be paid. The real transaction was this, that the shares were to have 5s. per share paid in cash, and 15s. per share additional was to be credited as paid up, not because it was in fact paid or because it represented actual value, but merely as representing nothing. The case is not put on the ground that, at the time when the shares were issued, this 15s. per share represented assets which have been lost since; but it is admitted that there was nothing then in existence to represent it. It seems to me that there is a dilemma out of which there is no way of escape. Either the transaction was that which it is stated to be in the petition; or the new company bought the property of the old company on the terms of discharging all the liabilities of the old company and the costs of the winding up and agreeing to give to all the shareholders in the old company in lieu of their shares in the old company a similar number of shares in the new company credited with 15s. per share paid up. If all the old shareholders had taken shares in the new company there would have been 15s. all round. But it was contemplated that there might be some shareholders in the old company who would not or could not take shares in the new company, and those persons would be entitled to received compensation under the provisions of section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, for their interests in the old company, and the agreement provided, amongst other things, for the taking over by the new company of all liability to dissentient members of the old company. The transaction really contemplated was that the shareholders who should take shares in the new company would receive value to the amount of 15s. per share and would incur a liability of 5s. per share only; and if that is the true basis there is nothing to show that the value which they got has ceased to be available assets of the new company. But the petition is addressed to the case, that in point of fact that 15s. per share represented nothing; or, in other words, that the £1 shares were issued at a discount of 15s. per share. In my opinion such a transaction is not legal, and has not the effect of relieving the shareholders from liability to pay up 15s. per share beyond the 5s. per share. In re Addlestone Linoleum Co. applies exactly to the present case. Having regard to the way in which the matter is brought before me, I can only say that no case has been shown which can justify me in confirming the proposed reduction of capital.

Robson v. The Owner of "The Kate" (a.)

County court—Jurisdiction—"Damage by collision"—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-section 3—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4.

Damage occasioned by the gear of a sailing ship coming into contact with an object on land is not "damage by collision" within section 3, sub-section 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, so as to give jurisdiction to the county court.

This was an application, under the County Courts Act of 1856, for a rule calling upon the judge of the City of London Court to show cause why he should not try a case which arose under the following circumstances.

The defendant was the owner of the sailing barge Kate, and while the barge was sailing in the Blackwall reach of the Thames its sailing gear came into contact with and injured a pile-driving machine belonging to the plaintiff. The plaintiff thereupon sued the defendant in the London County Court for "damage by collision." The county court judge held that the damage was not damage by collision within the Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts, and therefore that he had no jurisdiction.

Edward Pollock, in support of the application.—The damage caused in this case was clearly the result of collision, and should therefore fall within the admiralty jurisdiction of the county court. The violent contact of a vessel in the water with a pier or other object on shore constitutes "collision" within section 3, sub-section 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868. The jurisdiction conferred by that Act is extended by the Act of 1869 to "all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise." It may reasonably be inferred that the section was intended to give jurisdiction in the converse case of damage done by ships.

He cited The Malvina, 31 L. J. Adm. 113, 10 W. R. Adm. Dig. 28.

Wills, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be refused. The extended jurisdiction conferred on certain county courts by the County Courts Jurisdiction Act, 1868, is essentially an admiralty jurisdiction, limited as regards amount. It is not necessary to define the word "collision." The words "damage by collision," used, as here, in an Act the object of which is to confer an "admiralty" jurisdiction, cannot be construed as including damage which has taken place on land outside the ebb and flow of the tide, and which would certainly not have fallen within the original jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in respect to collision. The statute does not, as it appears to me, either in terms or by inference, extend the jurisdiction of a county court to the damage of which the applicant complains.

The rule must therefore be refused.

Grantham, J.—I am of the same opinion. In Everard v. Kendall, 18 W. R. 892, L. R. 5 C. P. 428, which was a proceeding by way of prohibition under this Act, Montague Smith, J., is reported to have said:—"What is the meaning of 'damage by collision?' We have nothing to guide us as to what damage by collision is within the Act, except the general scope and object of the Act. In common understanding, and as understood in the Court of Admiralty, damage by collision is damage sustained by a ship from another ship coming in contact with it." This explanation seems to me well founded, and I think the preceding words, "damage to cargo," which obviously refer to damage to cargo while on board a ship, tend to show that the intention of the Legislature was to confine the newly-conferred jurisdiction to cases of collision between ships.

Rule refused.

REG. v. MAYOR OF WAKEFIELD. (a.)

Highway and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 10—Indictment for non-repair—County authority—Highway authority.

An indictment will lie, under section 10 of the 41 & 42 Vict. c. 77, against the highway authority of a district for non-repair of a highway.

Quære, whether such indictment, being entirely of a statutable character, should not show on its face that all the steps enacted by section 10 had been previously taken.

This was a rule obtained by the mayor, aldermen, and the burgesses of the borough of Wakefield, as highway authority, calling upon the county authority of the West Riding to show cause why an indictment found against the highway authority should not be quashed.

The facts were as follows:—

A complaint had been made to the county authority that the highway authority of Wakefield had made default in repairing a highway within their jurisdiction, and the county authority had, after due investigation, ordered the highway authority to repair the same. The highway authority gave formal notice to the county authority that they declined to comply with the order until their liability to repair should be determined by a judge and jury.

The county authority thereupon directed that an indictment should be preferred against the highway authority to test their liability to repair. A true bill was found against the highway authority at the assizes, but the indictment contained no allegation that the provisions of section 10 of the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77) had been complied with.

Forbes, Q.C. (Atkinson with him), showed cause.—All the steps ordered to be taken by section 10 of 41 & 42 Vict. c. 77 have been taken. [He was stopped.]

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Asquith, in support of the rule.—An indictment was not known against a sanitary authority for non-repair of a highway prior to 1878. The 10th section of the 41 & 42 Vict. c. 77, passed in that year, only directs that the liability of the sanitary authority to repair shall be tried by indictment, but this does not intend that the old procedure shall be departed from. The indictment should still be preferred against the inhabitants: Reg. v. Mayor of Poole, 19 Q. B. D. 602. Further, if the statute means that the highway or sanitary authority should be indicted, the indictment, being statutory, should show on its face that all the earlier steps required by section 10 have been complied with. [The COURT held that the further point was not arguable under the terms of the rule.]

CAVE, J.—We have to construe the meaning of section 10 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, and to my mind it is very clear. This section, first of all, points out how a county authority may compel a highway authority to maintain or repair a highway. It says, "Where complaint is made to the highway authority . . . the county authority, if satisfied, after due inquiry and report by their surveyor, that the authority has been guilty of the alleged default, shall make an order limiting a time for the performance of the duty of the highway authority in the matter of such complaint. If such duty is not performed by the time limited in the order, and the highway authority fail to show to the county authority sufficient cause why the order has not been complied with, the county authority may appoint some person to perform such duty, and shall, by order, direct that the expenses of performing the same . . . shall be paid by the authority in default." This is followed by provisions for enforcing the order. Up to this point there is no suggestion of any indictment or otherwise against the highway authority, other than the order directing them to repair, and the power to do the work and to charge them with the expense in case of disobedience to the order. The section next deals with cases in which the highway authority do not admit their liability to do the work. It provides that "where an order has been made by a county authority for the repair of a highway on a highway authority alleged to be in default, if such authority within ten days . . . give notice to the clerk of the peace that they decline to comply with the requisitions of such order until their liability to repair the highway . . . has been determined by a jury, it shall be the duty of the county authority either to satisfy the defaulting authority by cancelling or modifying in such way as the authority may desire the order of the county authority, or else to submit to a jury the question of the liability of the defaulting authority to repair the highway. If the county authority decide to submit the question to a jury they shall direct a bill of indictment to be prepared to the next practicable assizes to be holden in and for their county, with a view to try the liability of the defaulting authority to repair the highway." This, then, is a special mode of indictment provided by statute and quite distinct from the old indictment against a parish for the non-repair of a highway. The statute provides a particular way for enabling a highway authority to test the question of its liability. Then see what follows: If a jury find them guilty, or, in other words, come to the conclusion that they have no good cause for disobeying the order, the defaulting authority is not visited with the ordinary consequences of a verdict of guilty on an ordinary indictment for non-repair, but simply this—viz., the suspended order regains its force, and they must either repair themselves or the county authority appoints someone else to do the work, and the costs are paid out of the funds applicable to the maintenance of the roads within the district of the defaulting authority. In the absence of the special machinery of the indictment provided by this statute a defaulting authority would be compelled to do the work without a specific mode of bringing their objections before a judge and a jury, and on their success in substantiating their objections before that court depends whether the order of the county authority shall come into force or become void. The section further enacts that "the costs of the indictment and of the proceedings consequent thereon shall be paid by such parties to the proceedings as the court before whom the case is tried may direct." The costs directed to be paid by the highway authority are to be deemed to be expenses properly incurred by such authority. But how can costs be directed to be paid by a highway authority unless they are parties to the proceedings? It is absolutely clear that the statute intends the indictment to lie against the highway authority. If it did not it would lie against the inhabitants, and then the inhabitants indicted would have to pay the costs.

Hearing before the court itself of the wife's petition for dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery and cruelty. The cruelty consisted in the communication of disease on four separate occasions.

The case was undefended, and the court, having found the charges proved, pronounced a decree nisi, and gave the custody of the children to the petitioner.

Notice had been served on the respondent that the petitioner would also apply, under section 7 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, for a declaration "that the respondent is a person unfit to have the custody of the children of the marriage."

Section 7 provides that "the parent so declared to be unfit shall not, upon the death of the other parent, be entitled as of right to the custody or guardianship of such children."

Bargrave Deane, for the petitioner, made the application in terms of the notice.

HANNEN, P.—As no cause is shown I shall make the order, which, however, will have no operation till after the death of the petitioner, as I have just made an order for her to have the custody of the children, which operates till then. Serious questions, however, may arise under this section, as there are cases in which, though a husband is guilty, he has been allowed to have the custody of the children of the marriage.

BOSVILE v. BOSVILE AND CRAVEN. (a.)

Practice—Variation of settlements—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5—"Application of the property"—Powers of appointment.

Per Butt, J.—Under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, the court has power to deprive one of the parties to the marriage settlement of the powers of appointment amongst the children of the marriage, but quære as to the power of appointment of new trustees.

The court deprived a guilty wife of the power of appointment amongst the children of the marriage, but where the wife was allowed to retain an income of £100 a year under the settlement the court refused to exercise its power, assuming that it existed, of depriving her of the right to appoint or join in the appointment of new trustees of the settlement.

Motion to confirm the registrar's report on the husband's petition for variation of settlements.

On February 11, 1886, the court made absolute a decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage obtained by the husband on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondents.

By the marriage settlement £25,000 was settled upon trust to pay £150 a year to the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife, and the residue of the income to the husband.

In case the respondent survived her husband the whole income of the fund was to be paid to her for life, but in the event of her re-marriage her income was to be reduced to £500 a year.

After the death of the petitioner and the death or re-marriage of the respondent the fund (subject in the last event to payment of the annuity of £500) was to be held in trust for all or such one or more of the issue of the marriage as the petitioner and respondent might jointly appoint, or in default of such appointment as the petitioner, if he survived the respondent, might appoint, or in default of any appointment in trust equally among all the children of the marriage, and the settlement contained all usual clauses.

There was one child of the marriage.

The registrar recommended (1) that the respondent should be deprived of a portion of the £150 per annum payable to her under the settlement; (2) that the trustees of the settlement should apply the money settled and deal with it without the respondent having any control over it, and that she should be deprived of her power of appointment to a share in the trust moneys; (3) that the consent or written consent of the respondent should not hereafter be necessary for the exercise of any of the powers conferred by the said indenture upon the trustees, and that the trustees should hereafter exercise all such powers upon and with such consent only as would be necessary in case the respondent were now dead; and (4) that the respondent should be deprived of the power of appointing or joining in the appointment of new trustees, and that such powers should hereafter be exercised by such person or persons as would be entitled to exercise the same in case she were dead.

Inderwick, Q.C. (Middleton with him), for the petitioner, in moving to affirm the report, stated that the petitioner was willing that £100 per annum should be the amount to be secured to the respondent by the orders.

Ram, for the respondent.—A wife or other party to a settlement cannot be deprived of her powers of appointment under it unless she consents: Oppenheim v. Oppenheim, 32 W. R. 723, 9 P. D. 60; Noel v. Noel, 33 W. R. 552, 10 P. D. 179. Section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, refers only to the application of the property included in the settlement, and the power of the court is limited to that: Davies v. Davies, 37 L. J. P. & M. 17, 16 W. R. Prob. Dig. 12; Hope v. Hope, 23 W. R. 110, L. R. 3 P. & D. 226. The power of appointment amongst children may arise if the child of the marriage marries and has children.

Inderwick, Q.C., in reply, referred to Maudsley v. Maudsley, 2 P. D. 256, 26 W. R. Dig. 80.

BUTT, J.—This case is brought before me in a not very regular way, for it is an application to confirm the registrar's report, and if I were simply to affirm that report I should, as to the first paragraph, make no order at all. In the first paragraph the registrar recommends that the respondent should be deprived of a portion of the £150 per annum payable to her under the settlement. I have to make up my mind as to what portion she should be deprived of. At the outset I was inclined to think that the wife should have the whole £150, but on consideration, having regard to the facts of the case—that the lady left her husband's home with the adulterer under circumstances offering no palliation or excuse, and that her husband had throughout behaved exceedingly well to her, I am not disposed to give her more than the £100 which he has offered. That sum must remain to her and be secured under the settlement. That disposes of the first question.

With regard to the other matters, the report suggests that the trustees of the settlement should apply the property settled and deal with the same without the respondent having any control over it, and that she should be deprived of her power of appointment. First of all, ought I to revoke her power of appointment as to the money mentioned in the deed? It has been argued that I have no power, that my powers, under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, are limited to making an order "with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled." It is said that if I take away the wife's power of appointment I am making an order which has no reference to the "application" of the property settled. I do not agree with that contention. I think I have the power under the words of the section. Then, having the power, ought I to exercise it? I see no reason why I should not, and therefore I shall adopt the suggestion of the report, and direct that the trustees of the indenture shall pay and apply the property thereby settled upon such and the same trusts as would be applicable thereto in case the respondent were now dead and had died in the lifetime of the petitioner. That is, of course, subject to the reservation as to the application of the £100 a year which I have already dealt with.

I adopt the third recommendation of the report, and make it part of my order.

Then comes the fourth recommendation, that the respondent should be deprived of any power of appointment or of joining in the appointment of new trustees. It having been argued that I had no power, under section 5, to interfere with the wife's power of appointment over the money, it was put as an à fortiori argument that I have no power to deprive her of the right of appointment of new trustees. I am by no means clear whether I have that power, but it is not necessary to decide it, for, inasmuch as the wife is to continue to receive part of the income of the trust funds, I do not think that, even if I had the power, it would be right that I should deprive her of her voice in the vote on the appointment of trustees. That part, therefore, of the recommendation I refuse to adopt.

My order is that the wife be deprived of £50 out of the £150 per annum; that the second and third recommendations of the report be adopted and the fourth disallowed. The husband, I understand, abandons any claim to after-acquired property.

Patent—Practice—Discovery—Particulars of objection—Patents, &c., Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.

In an action to restrain threats of legal proceedings for infringements of patents, the plaintiffs alleged that the patents upon which the defendants relied in making threats were invalid. The defendants applied that the plaintiffs should give particulars of their objections to the patents.

Held (affirming the decision of North, J., ante, p. 263), that before the plaintiffs could be required to give such particulars the defendants should give to the plaintiffs a list of the patents on which, and on which only, the defendants relied, and that the plaintiffs should undertake to amend their statement of claim so as to put in issue the validity of those patents only.

Appeal from the decision of North, J. (reported ante, p. 263).

The action was brought under section 32 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, for an injunction to restrain the defendants threatening legal proceedings against customers of the plaintiffs in respect of electrical batteries manufactured and sold by the plaintiffs. The defendants had, in the threats which they published, claimed to be owners of patent rights in respect of the batteries in question, and had based their threats of legal proceedings on such patents, but the plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, alleged that the patents on which the defendants relied were invalid. The defendants took out a summons that the plaintiffs should give particulars of their objections to the validity of the patents.

North, J., held that the defendants ought to give to the plaintiffs a list of the patents on which the defendants relied before the plaintiffs were bound to give the particulars of objection asked for.

The defendants appealed, claiming to be entitled to have the particulars of objection delivered to them without their being first obliged to give to the plaintiffs the list of patents on which the defendants relied.

Moulton, Q.C., and J. C. Graham, for the appellants.

R. W. Wallace, for the respondents.

The nature of the arguments appears sufficiently from the judgment of Cotton, L.J.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an action brought under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, to restrain the defendants from threatening with legal proceedings customers of the plaintiffs in respect of certain electrical batteries manufactured by the plaintiffs, and which the defendants allege are infringements of their patents. The plaintiffs allege that the defendants have no rights under those patents, as the patents are invalid. The defendants applied for particulars of objections to the patents. North, J., ordered the plaintiffs to give particulars, but required the defendants first to give to the plaintiffs a list of the patents on which the defendants relied before the plaintiffs should give the particulars asked for. That seems to me to be right. The defendants should say by what patents they justify their threats, and the plaintiffs then must confine their objections to those patents or some of them. Mr. Moulton said that such an order would put him in this difficulty, that if the plaintiffs' objections applied to all the defendants' patents he would have to put in a defence putting in issue the validity of all the patents. The plaintiffs, however, state they are willing, when the defendants have stated on what patents they rely, to alter the statement of claim so as to put in issue the validity of those patents only. The defendants ought to state, not only on which patents they rely, but that they rely on no others. The appeal will therefore be dismissed, the plaintiffs giving an undertaking to amend in the way I have mentioned.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

In August, 1880, the Corporation of Birmingham agreed with one Daniell, the predecessor in title of the plaintiffs, to grant him a lease of a certain piece of land and of a house to be built thereon. The lease was granted when the house was built in 1882, and the lease contained these general words, "together with the shops, messuages, or dwelling-houses, auction room, store rooms, and buildings erected thereon, . . . and together with the rights, members, and appurtenances to the said premises belonging." The piece of land demised to Daniell by the corporation had been purchased by the corporation together with the surrounding land for improvement purposes, and the house in question, when built, faced on one side Corporation-street, and on the other side a new street called Warwick-passage, the latter being a narrow street, only twenty feet wide. The defendant had obtained a lease from the corporation of the premises on the opposite side of Warwick-passage, which in the year 1882 was only occupied by a low building or shed, used as a stable, and built thereon a high building for the purpose of an hotel. This building materially interfered with light which would otherwise have access to the windows in the plaintiffs' house.

The plaintiffs, who were assignees of Daniell, brought an action against the defendant for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendant to pull down so much of his building as interfered with the access of light as enjoyed by the plaintiffs at the time when the lease was granted to their predecessor in title.

Kekewich, J., refused the injunction.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Barber, Q.C., and Methold, for the respondent.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs against a decision of Kekewich, J., who dismissed the action with costs, and the object of the action is to restrain an interference by the defendant with the light which but for the building of the defendant would have access to the windows of the house belonging to the plaintiffs. It is not a case of ancient lights. It is a question depending on the grant from the Corporation of Birmingham to the predecessor in title of the plaintiffs, the defendant being also a lessee under that corporation. [The Lord Justice then stated the facts, and continued:—] On what grounds do the plaintiffs contend that they have a right to interfere with the building and to have an injunction to compel the defendant to pull down a considerable portion of that building? It was put by Sir Horace Davey on this ground, that they had an express grant of light which entitled them to all the light which would come to their windows if there was no building erected on the other side of Warwick-passage higher than the building which there was at the time when the lease was granted to their predecessor in title, and the plaintiffs by their action did not seek to have the entire building pulled down, or to have it pulled down to the level of the old building which was then existing, but they were content to say: "Well, we will not require more of the defendant's building to be pulled down than will bring it to the same height as the house which we have." That was a little misleading, but that ought not to be used to the prejudice of the case of the plaintiffs. They put their case on the ground that by the lease there is an express grant to Daniell, their predecessor in title, of such light as could then have access to his windows. Now that is a most material question to be considered in the present case. We do not find any mention of lights in the lease. It is a demise on the 28th of September, 1882, of the piece of ground and the house upon it, and it is not perhaps immaterial to read some words which follow, "together with the shops, messuages, or dwelling-houses, auction rooms, store rooms, and buildings erected thereon, together with full and free right and liberty to construct, maintain, and use a vault or vaults under the footway." Then there are a good many more words: "And also together with the rights, members, and appurtenances to the said premises belonging." There is no express grant of light there. Of course a conveyance of a house would carry whatever right there was to any light which came to the house. But that is not the contention. The contention is that there is an express grant by the landlord of a new easement over the landlord's land which was on the other side of Warwick-passage. But in my opinion that is not the proper construction or meaning of these words. It is very true that when a man grants a house he grants that which is necessary for the existence of that house, and it might have been a serious question here if it had been shown that the interference of the light was of such a character as entirely to prevent the house of the plaintiffs being used as a house. But that was not the case made. It was only admitted by the defendant that there was such an interference as would justify the court in granting an injunction if there had been ancient windows, or if the grant was such as Sir Henry Davey contended for. Section 6, sub-section (2), of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, was not, I think, referred to in the arguments by either side, but we ought to mention it to show that it has not been overlooked, because it provides that "a conveyance of land having houses or other buildings thereon shall be deemed to include, and shall by virtue of this Act operate to convey, with the land, houses, or other buildings, all outhouses, &c., and all passages, lights, watercourses, liberties, privileges, easements, rights, and advantages whatsoever appertaining or reputed to appertain to the lands and houses, or other buildings conveyed or any of them or any part thereof at the time of conveyance demised, occupied, or enjoyed, with or reputed or known as part or parcel of or appurtenant to the land, houses, or other buildings conveyed or any of them or any part thereof."

Then there is a proviso that the section applies if and so far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the document. Well, in my opinion, even with the assistance afforded us by the language of this deed, this could not be said to be a light, within the meaning of this section, enjoyed with the house. The house had only recently been erected, and at the time when this lease was granted it was obvious to both parties that this was a large tract of land bought by the Corporation of Birmingham for the purpose of effecting an improvement, and for the purpose of being laid out so as to have buildings upon it, and at the time when the lease was granted Corporation-street had only just been formed, and there was no plan of the buildings upon it, but it was the duty of the corporation, as of course it would be their interest, to lay the land out in such a way as to make it available for recouping the expenses, and also to be an improvement to this portion of Birmingham. Therefore I think it could not be said that the light coming over that low building to the plaintiffs' windows could be considered as enjoyed with the plaintiffs' houses or buildings within the meaning of this section. The light at the time did in fact come over the low building, but it came over it under such circumstances as to show that there could be no expectation of the continuance of it. It had not been enjoyed in fact for any long period, and it was enjoyed under such circumstances, known to both parties, as could not make it light enjoyed within the meaning of that section, which, in my opinion, means not light which a person has a right to under the statute, but that which he has enjoyed under circumstances which would lead to an expectation that the enjoyment of that light would be continued, and that it would not be simply precarious.

Then as to the words of the lease, "and also together with all rights, members, and appurtenances to the said premises belonging." The case under the Conveyancing Act would have been stronger if it had not been for them, they point to a conveyance of all such rights, if any, as belong to the premises, and the introduction of those general words, in my opinion, points to this, that the light which in fact came at the time of the lease to the house and buildings could not be considered as being expressly granted by any words of this lease.

Now, if that is so, we have to consider what the rights of the plaintiffs are, and in my opinion such rights as they have must be implied rights. I think myself that it is a question whether there is any implied obligation on the corporation, which of course the defendant would be subject to, not to interfere with these lights. I say that because that was the view which not only I, but the Master of the Rolls, took in a previous case of Rigby v. Bennett, but also the view of Lord Cranworth when Lord Chancellor in the Caledonian Railway Co. v. Sprot, 4 W. R. 659, 2 Macq. 449. By obligation by implication I mean this, an obligation arising not from the express words of an instrument nor from that which, having regard to the circumstances, must be considered the true meaning and effect of the words in the instrument, but an obligation which results, not from the terms of the contract, but from the position in which the parties have placed themselves by the contract. For instance, where one man grants to another a house, then, primâ facie, he cannot interfere with that which he has granted; there is an implied obligation on him not to interfere with that which he has granted—the house and enjoyment of the house. That obligation arises, as I say, not from any express covenant, not from any interpretation of the words of the conveyance, but from the duty which is imposed on the grantor in consequence of the relation which he has taken upon himself towards the grantee.

But, then, when there is an implied obligation we must have regard to all the circumstances and facts which existed at the time when the conveyance was executed which brought the parties into that relation from which the implied obligation results. I quite agree that we ought not to have regard to any agreement during the negotiations entered into between the plaintiffs and the corporation, except in this way, if we find that any particular space in fact was left open at the time when the lease was granted, and that open space was contracted to be left open during the negotiation which took place, and is not referred to in the lease, we must have regard to the fact of that open space being left, and we must have regard to the fact that by agreement between the parties the lessor had bound himself not to build upon that space, and also we must, in my opinion, in determining what obligation results from the position in which the parties have put themselves, have regard to all the facts existing at the time when the conveyance was made or when the lease was granted, and which were known to both parties. Of course we must be satisfied that they were known to both parties.

Now what was the existing state of things here? There was the new street—Corporation-street—of very great size; there was the open passage—Warwick-passage—stipulated to be 20ft. in width, and which was then existing, and it was obvious to Daniell, as well as to the corporation, that the adjoining land would be utilized for the purpose of the corporation making money out of it, and although I was at first startled by the great height of the defendant's house, yet in my opinion Daniell, when the lease was granted, knew that the lease was being granted of a piece of land in a new street for the purpose of having a building put upon it, and was acquainted with the obvious fact that the corporation were going to lay out the remainder of the street for building houses suitable for the locality. But if the contention of Sir H. Davey were the true one, that he has a right to such light as then came, it would entirely prevent the corporation from utilizing the land in any way except by putting up a low building like the stables or one-storied building then existing upon the land on the other side of Warwick-passage. In my opinion it is impossible to imply an obligation on the corporation not to let their land in any way for building otherwise than for erecting such building as was on it at that time, and if we cannot do that I cannot see how any line can be drawn as to the obligation they undertook as regards building; because, unless we are to say that they undertook an obligation not to put up any building higher than that which then existed, I cannot see where we can impose any obligation or fix any line as to the height to which buildings might be put. The plaintiffs say reasonably, "We do not want all the defendant's building pulled down," but I feel a difficulty in saying that they have any right as regards the height of buildings erected unless they can establish their right that there should be no building put up so as to interfere with the light which, at the time when the lease was granted, passed to this house. If there had been an express grant, then it would have been the duty of the grantor or of the lessor to expressly state what right he reserved to himself. A reservation of right to a grantor is a very different thing from an obligation impliedly undertaken by a grantor, because when there is a reservation to himself, that is a reservation from that which he has in terms granted, and if a lessor or other grantor wants to make any reservation in his own favour, then in my opinion that stands on a very different footing from any implied obligation contracted by him in consequence of the position in which he places himself. Wheeldon v. Burrows is a case which, on that point, would be a strong authority, and which I, of course, agree with. But, in my opinion, when we come to the question which arises here of implied obligation and implied grant, we may have regard to all the circumstances existing at the time when the parties undertook the position from which the implied obligation arises, and, looking at the circumstances existing at the time when the lease was made, I am of opinion that here the plaintiffs cannot assert any implied obligation on the part of the corporation which will enable the plaintiffs to say that there is an interference with any implied obligation on the part of the defendant.

I think I had better mention that it was argued by Mr. Barber that there could be no implied obligation where the land granted was not immediately connected with land retained by the grantor. That question does not arise for decision, but I do not in any way express any opinion favourable to that contention. On the grounds which I have already stated I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In order to decide this case properly it appears to me that there are two preliminary points for investigation. First of all, what are the terms of the lease to Daniell—that is the first thing, and the second thing is, under what circumstances was that lease granted?

Now if we look at Daniell's lease, which is the important document in this case, we do not find in it any express words creating any new easement over the land retained by the corporation. There is nothing express about that; it is a grant of a house and so on, as Cotton, L.J., has mentioned more in detail, but we do not find any express words creating any new easement.

Now, that being so, we must proceed to consider what was the state of things existing at the time that lease was granted. I think Sir Horace Davey was right in saying that we are not to go into the preliminary negotiations which resulted in the final lease. They might be important, and perhaps would be necessarily important, if we were considering whether the lease should be rectified or not. But for the purpose of construing the lease all such considerations as those ought to be disregarded. But the state of the property is all important, and what was being done with it was all important.

Now what we know about that is this. That this large area, the area on which the plaintiffs' house and the area on which the defendant's house was built, was recently created by the destruction of a mass of houses by the corporation, and the whole area was intended to be relaid out and built upon by the corporation. One part of the area was to be traversed by that large street called Corporation-street, and Daniell's house was to face Corporation-street. On the side of Daniell's house, where there is now a narrow street called Warwick-passage, there had been no such street; it was, as I understand, a mass of houses—that street did not exist at all. That street was created at the time that Daniell's house was agreed to be let, and before or at the time when it was begun to be built, and it appears to me that the history of that street is the key to the situation here. Having regard to the creation of that street and the facts to which I have alluded, it appears to me that it is impossible fairly and properly to imply such an easement as Sir H. Davey is driven to contend for. It appears to me that the true construction of Daniell's lease, coupled with the circumstances to which I have alluded, is this—that in talking of these easements as newly created, what was newly created was a right to such an amount of light as would come over the corporation land to Daniell's house after the corporation had built what they liked upon it, upon the other side of that twenty feet street. That is the only implied grant which I can imply or infer or arrive at from the terms of the deed and the circumstances to which I have alluded.

Now if that be true of course there is no deception from the grant at all, and we are clear of Wheeldon v. Burrows and every other case. It appears to me that when we bear in mind what the grant of an easement of this kind is, it is really, more properly speaking, perhaps, an implied covenant by the grantor not to use his own land in some definite way so as to injure the rights of Daniell and those claiming under him. If we look at it in that point of view the very same result is arrived at. What sort of obligation was the corporation laying itself under as regards the obstruction of Daniell's lights? I can come to no other conclusion than this, that it was perfectly understood and known to all that the land was to be built upon in any way the corporation liked, subject only to this, that there was to be a distance of twenty feet of land, which was the measure of Daniel's protection.

Upon the other point which was raised by Mr. Barber—namely, that there is no case which goes to show that there is an easement granted or implied in a case of this description when there is a piece of vacant land left between what is granted and what is retained—I am not prepared to assent to that. He has not cited any authority for it, and his argument on principle did not satisfy me about it at all; and I do not think myself that there is any sound distinction. The case which arose in the Curriers' Co. v. Corbett, 13 W. R. 538, 2 Dr. & Sm. 355, was the converse, and I cannot see any rational foundation for the distinction. I do not assent to that part of his argument, but the other, I think, is well founded, and therefore I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—The real question which we have to consider here is the application which has been attempted to be made by Sir Horace Davey of the maxim that a grantor shall not derogate from his own grant, a maxim which really is as old, I will not say as the hills, but as old as the year books, and a great deal older. We have to apply it to the question of a house and of lights. I pause for a moment, for the sake of perspicuity, to observe that it is incorrect to speak of the right to light as an ordinary easement. The distinction between an affirmative easement, such as a right of way, and what be may be called a quasi-easement or negative easement, such as a right to light or a right to support, is well known; but still, with regard to all these easements, or quasi-easements, the principle will be applied in case of necessity by the law that a grantor is not, having given a thing with one hand, to take away the means of enjoying it with the other. And this principle will be carried out by a necessary implication of whatever fiction is required to support the origin of the right not to be interfered with by the grantor. The case of an affirmative easement may well be different from the case of a negative easement like light. Window light is not like a right of way; it does not begin in acts of enjoyment which are primâ facie an encroachment upon a neighbour's soil; it is acquired by occupancy upon one's own soil, and, therefore, there is no necessity to suppose that, in its origin, it originates from what is, strictly speaking, called a grant. But it originates no doubt (when it is acquired by user) in some consent on the part of the person who has the right to obstruct the light. Some consensual origin it must have, but I agree with what has been said in the terms which have been employed by Cotton, L.J., that a right not to have your windows obstructed, if it exists, is rather in the nature of a right that arises from an implied obligation or an implied covenant than from what is, strictly speaking, called a grant.

But, coming down to the amount of enjoyment of light that is supposed by the law to accompany, in an ordinary case, the lease or the gift of a house which is erected with window lights, where the grantor of the house is also the owner of premises adjoining or neighbouring premises, then this presumption arises, that the grantor intends the grantee to enjoy so much light unobstructed as is reasonably necessary for the fair and comfortable use of the premises which are the subject of the grant. That seems to me to be the real definition and measure of the ordinary implication that arises. Sir H. Davey asked us to consider that the measure of the right which, in ordinary cases of a grant, arose was the same as the measure of enjoyment of ancient lights. I confess I do not at the present moment assent to that view. The extent of the right in the case of ancient lights is measured, not by what is reasonably necessary, but by what has been in fact enjoyed, and although it is perfectly true that a court of equity will not interfere by injunction and the common law will not interfere by damages to give relief for a nominal interruption of light which is not attended with a material diminution of convenience, still, the measure of the light in the case of ancient lights seems to me to be different from the measure of the right which accompanies in ordinary cases a grant by a grantor.

I pause for another moment to say a word about Mr. Barber's argument. Mr. Barber argued, I think with some courage, that this doctrine that the grantor granted so much as was reasonably necessary for the complete enjoyment of the premises did not arise, except where the tenement granted really adjoined physically the tenement which was left in the hands of the grantor. I do not believe there is any authority for that proposition. I do not think it is founded in reason any more than upon authority, and it seems to me that it is only necessary to evoke the doctrine to which I have alluded to show that the premises shall be so adjacent as that the enjoyment of the one should be evidently connected with and dependent upon the state of the other premises. But though this is in the ordinary case the character, it seems to me, of the grant which arises or the right to light which is created in the case of the grant or demise of a house, what is the nature of this obligation? Sir Horace Davey, with a stroke of what I call brilliant advocacy, endeavoured to escape from, I think, the logic of the case by saying that it was an express grant after all. If he could have made that out, of course he would have landed his client, at least, I think, very nearly landed his client. But the obligation which is created under such circumstances is not, to my mind, an express obligation at all, it is not an obligation which arises on reading the terms of the deed. It is not an obligation which arises simply from the interpretation of that deed. It is really an obligation which arises from the relation which the deed creates, from the circumstances outside the deed, and the deed taken together. The deed places the parties in a relation in which it is necessary that the law should imply an obligation to protect the grantee against subsequent encroachments by the grantor. What seems to me to show that, is, amongst other things, the following consideration. Supposing the deed is taken alone, no amount of construction could evolve from the deed itself the protection which the grantee of the deed desires. The grantor may not have had the power of giving the protection which is necessary for the enjoyment of that which he grants, and it is only by going outside the deed, and looking outside it, that it can be seen that such a power of protection on the part of the grantor in favour of the grantee exists. It is only by looking to the title outside the deed that the implication of a duty arises. I think that is the effect of the language and view of the House of Lords in The Caledonian Railway Co. v. Sprot. I think it is what was meant by the Master of the Rolls and Cotton, L.J., in the case of Rigby v. Bennett, and it is that view which has received additional weight from the judgment of Chitty, J., in the case of Beddington v. Atlee, 35 W. R. 799, 35 Ch. D. 317.

Now if it is an obligation which arises from an implication, it must be measured by all the surrounding circumstances. Whatever presumption arises in favour of the ordinary implication can be rebutted in exactly the same way as every other presumption can be rebutted. I do not think any hard and fast line can be laid down beyond which evidence is not to be admitted to rebut it, or rather to measure the implication itself. Here we have some salient facts which seem to me to prove, as far as my mind goes, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the right which they claim. At the time when Daniell took his lease or bargained for his lease, and erected the house, he knew perfectly well that houses were to be built on the opposite side of Warwick-passage. He confesses it. It did not cross his mind before, as I read the evidence, that there would be any limitation upon the legal power of the corporation to build houses upon the opposite side of Warwick-passage. He knew they were going to build there. He knew perfectly well that if they once built houses above the level of the house that was then in existence or above the level of his own lights there must be some interference with his lights; there was no stipulation as to how high they were to run up the houses, and therefore either they were not to build at all or there was to be some danger of his lights being interfered with.

What was the protection under such circumstances to which he looked? I think he looked to the protection of the width of the passage. That there was a negotiation about the width of the passage we know, and ultimately the width of the passage was fixed at twenty feet. There was the protection which he got, there was the measure of the right to light, which went as a necessary concomitant of the position of the parties under the grant. If we do not draw the line there I do not know where to draw it. Sir Horace Davey felt, I am satisfied, that difficulty himself, and fell back upon the position that he was entitled to all the lights that ancient windows would be entitled to. As I said a few minutes ago, I do not think in any view that is a true measure of what a house would be entitled to under the doctrine that a vendor must not derogate from his own grant; but, whether it is or not, it is inconsistent with the conclusion that all the parties here knew and intended that there should be buildings on the opposite side of Warwick-passage, and that the parties, when they negotiated for this grant, left the height of the buildings undefined. If Daniell had desired to protect himself further than by the width of the passage, in my opinion he ought to have done so expressly, because no implication in his favour beyond that which arises from the width of the passage seems to me to arise in this case.

I will not say what would be the case if the light had been absolutely destroyed. As Cotton, L.J., has reserved that point for consideration, I do not desire to express any opinion definitely one way or the other upon it. But that is not the case here, and in the present case I think the measure of the rights is that which I have stated.

WOOD v. ANDERSTON FOUNDRY CO. (a.)

Practice—Service—Company out of the jurisdiction but having branch works in England—Companies Act, 1862, s. 62—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 9, r. 8.

A company had their registered office in Scotland, but carried on branch works in England. The writ in the present action had been served on the manager of the branch works, and a copy had also been sent by post to the registered office.

Held, that the service was bad and must be set aside.

Motion.

This was an action to restrain the defendants from infringing the plaintiff's patent. The defendants were a company formed under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, and having their registered office at 100, Cheapside-street, Glasgow. Their works were in that town and their business was carried on there. The company had also extensive branch works at Middlesborough, in Yorkshire. In an action previously commenced by the company against the present plaintiff they had described themselves as of Middlesborough and Glasgow. The writ in the present action was served within the jurisdiction, the plaintiff describing the defendants as of Middlesborough-upon-Tees, in the county of York. It was served in the first place by leaving it with a director of the company at Middlesborough, who appeared, upon the evidence, to be the manager of the company's business at that place. A copy of the writ was also posted to the office of the company at Glasgow.

The defendants now moved that the writ of summons and the service thereof and all subsequent proceedings, if any, might be set aside, on the ground that the defendants were domiciled in Scotland, and that this action ought to be tried there, and that the plaintiff might be ordered to pay to the defendants the costs of the action and of this motion.

Aston, Q.C., and Lawson, for the motion, argued that service had not been properly effected.—Section 62 of the Companies Act, 1862, as to service upon companies, had not been effected by ord. 9, r. 8, of the Rules of 1883.

They cited Newby v. Van Oppen, 20 W. R. 383, L. R. 7 Q. B. 293; Lhoneux, Limon, & Co. v. Hong Kong Bank, 34 W. R. 753, 33 Ch. D. 446; Baillie v. Goodwin & Co., 34 W. R. 787, 33 Ch. STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—The question is whether the plaintiff was at liberty to serve the writ as he has done. As a general rule a foreigner, whatever his nationality or domicile, is liable to be sued in this country if found within the jurisdiction. When a foreigner is a person, personal service may be effected upon him. But when a foreigner is a mere legal entity, such as a corporation, two questions arise. First, when can a foreign corporation be said to be within the jurisdiction; and secondly, if present, how can it be served? Both those questions were considered in Newby v. Van Oppen. Upon the first point the conclusion at which the court arrived was that, if you found a foreign corporation carrying on business within the jurisdiction, then they could be treated as resident there. Upon the second point Blackburn, J., delivering the judgment of the court, said:—"At common law the service of a writ on a corporation aggregate, which from the nature of the body could not be personal, was by serving it on a proper officer, so as to secure that it came to the knowledge of the corporation, and then proceeding by distress: see 1 Tidd's Practice, p. 131, ed. of 1828; the 2 Will. 4, c. 39, s. 13, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 16, in fact, only re-enact the old law as to what should be service on a corporation. The clerk or officer must be in the nature of a head officer, whose knowledge would be that of the corporation. We think that, when once it is established that the corporation is to be treated as resident in England, the proper officer is the officer at the English branch, and that it is not necessary to serve the process on the officer at the head office abroad." Now, with reference to the first point—viz., that a foreign corporation, if found carrying on business within the jurisdiction, may be treated as resident in England, there is nothing in the Judicature Acts or rules to alter that. As to the second point, as to how service is to be effected, the rules now in force have, I think, made a very great change. That is evident by comparing the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 with the present rules. Section 16 of that Act provided as follows:—"Every writ of summons issued against a corporation aggregate may be served on the mayor or other head officer, or on the town clerk, clerk, treasurer, or secretary of such corporation. . . ." And it was decided that sections 18 and 19, which related to actions against British subjects and foreigners residing out of the jurisdiction, did not apply to corporations.

Now, under the present rules, ord. 72, r. 2, must first be considered. That rule provides that where no other provision is made by the Acts or rules the existing procedure and practice is to remain in force. We have, therefore, to see whether any provision is made by the rules with reference to service upon corporations. The material rule is ord. 9, r. 8, which provides that "in the absence of any statutory provision regulating service of process, every writ of summons issued against a corporation aggregate may be served on the mayor or other head officer . . .; and where by any statute provision is made for service of any writ of summons . . . or other process upon any corporation . . . every writ of summons may be served in the manner so provided." So that the words, which in the Common Law Procedure Act, s. 16, stood unqualified and absolute, are now governed by these words—"In the absence of any statutory provision regulating service of process." It seems to me that these two clauses provide for different cases, and that the mode of service provided by the last clause is not cumulative or additional to that by the first clause. Service upon foreign corporations is, therefore, divided into two heads—(1) where there is no statutory provision regulating service of process; (2) where such statutory provision does exist. We have, therefore, to consider whether the present case is governed by any statutory provision within the rule.

The company was registered under the Companies Act of 1862, and section 62 of that Act provides that any summons or other document required to be served upon a company may be served by leaving the same or sending it through the post in a prepaid letter addressed to the company at their registered office. The words of the concluding clause of the rule are very remarkable, and bear evidence that it was framed to meet this case, and that view is confirmed by looking at the previous set of rules, which were rather differently worded, and the word "summons" seems to be introduced here for the purpose of introducing the provision contained in section 62 of the Companies Act, 1862. Therefore the writ of summons in this case must be served in manner provided by that section, and no choice is given to the plaintiff. I have now to consider the authorities to see if there is anything to conflict with that view. I was referred to the cases of Lhoneux, Limon, & Co. v. Hong Kong Bank and Baillie v. Goodwin & Co., but in my opinion neither of those cases conflict with the view I have expressed. The language of the report, however, in the case of Watson v. Sheather gives some colour to the view that the rule allows an alternative mode of service. However, I have had the opportunity of consulting Wills, J., who was a member of the court, and he has informed me that they simply held that there had been good service under the Act of 1862, and that they never indicated that a limited company could be served otherwise than as directed by that Act. It appears to me, therefore, that the service at Middlesborough was bad, and that the proceedings must be set aside as irregular. As to the service by letter to Glasgow, that was a service out of the jurisdiction for which leave ought to have been obtained. But the plaintiff has been almost invited to adopt the course he has taken by the defendants, who described themselves as of Middlesborough. Therefore, although I set aside the proceedings, it must be without costs. I have decided the question purely as a matter of right, and if the plaintiff should desire to make any application for leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction, that question will be quite unaffected by the present decision.

Solicitor and client—Confidential relation—Undue influence—Voluntary gift—Setting aside—Relation existing at time of gift—Election to abide by gift—Delay—Action by personal representative.

If a person, who has made a gift to a solicitor while the relation of solicitor and client subsisted between them, is entitled at the time of his death to have the gift set aside, the personal representative of the deceased, upon his death, succeeds to the right, although the deceased had no intention of exercising it, and had even expressed a determination not to do so—for he might have changed that determination the next day, and would have had a perfect right to do so.

A solicitor cannot take a gift from his client while the relation of solicitor and client subsists, and, in order to sustain such a gift, if made, something must be done, after the confidential relation has ceased, amounting to a release of the client's right to set aside the gift; but the subsequent settlement by the client of a bill of costs does not amount to such a release.

A., acting as solicitor for G. in an action, in June, 1880, recovered, by a compromise, £5,000 for her, which he received, and out of it, by her desire, retained £1,000 as a gift to himself. The relation of solicitor and client terminated shortly afterwards. In his evidence A. swore that in April, 1883, G. had told him that she had determined to adhere to what she had done. Since the severance of the relation G. had also settled a bill of costs, and had never done any act indicating an intention to recede from her gift. She died in June, 1883. Her administratrix commenced this action within six months, but died in October, 1884. In June, 1886, T. took out administration to G.'s effects, and in the following August he got an order of revivor in this action. Poverty was the excuse given for the delay.

Held, that the gift was bad at the time it was made; that G. had never effectually released her right to set it aside, and at the time of her death was entitled to exercise that right; that on her death her personal representative succeeded to the right; that it had been kept alive by the action notwithstanding the delay; and that the gift must consequently be now set aside.

Trial of action.

This action was brought against Messrs. John Alfred Alsop and John Pidsley Mann (who were the partners in the firm of Alsop, Mann, & Co. at the time the cause of action arose) by Mrs. Sarah Emily Tyars, as the legal personal representative of her late daughter Amy Graham, to set aside a gift of £1,000 alleged to have been made to the defendants by Miss Graham in June, 1880.

The action was commenced by Mrs. Tyars in December, 1883, Miss Graham having died in June of that year. Mrs. Tyars died in October, 1884, but in August, 1886, an order of revivor was made in favour of her husband, the present plaintiff, James Tyars, who had taken out administration to the unadministered assets of Miss Graham on the 30th of June, 1886.

It appeared that the defendants had acted as solicitors for Miss Graham (who was then about twenty-three years of age and unmarried) in an action of a delicate character brought by her against a gentleman, but which was compromised in June, 1880, upon the terms of the gentleman paying her a sum of £5,000 (subsequently reduced by agreement to £4,450) and paying her solicitors, the present defendants, a sum of £100 as agreed costs of that action. Out of the money, which was paid, in the first instance, to Messrs. Alsop & Mann, on the 5th of June, 1880, they retained a sum of £1,000, which they alleged to have been given them "as a special gift" by Miss Graham in recognition of their successful exertions on her behalf. The date of the transaction was fixed as being the 7th of June, 1880, and the relation of solicitor and client continued for some little time afterwards. It also appeared that some further proceedings were taken against the gentleman on behalf of Miss Graham by Messrs. Alsop & Mann, but these came to an end in March, 1882, when they finally ceased to act for her. Mr. Alsop stated in the witness-box that when Miss Graham came, in April, 1883, to ask him for a loan of £10, she told him that Mr. Tyars had been trying to persuade her to claim the £1,000 back, but she had refused, and always meant to abide by her gift. She died on the 8th of June, 1883. Shortly before her death Mr. Samuel Tilley, a solicitor, had written to the defendants on her behalf asking for some account of the cash transactions between them and Miss Graham, and on the 5th of June they sent such an account, and an explanation, in which they stated that the lady had made them a voluntary gift of £1,000 for the great and successful exertions they had made on her behalf. The plaintiff claimed repayment of the £1,000, with interest at five per cent. from the date of the gift.

Oswald, for the plaintiff.—There was no gift, as the money never came into Miss Graham's hands. A gift can only be supported by a deed of gift, or by actual delivery. The defendants say that, having the money in their own pockets, they retained part of it as a gift: Irons v. Smallpiece, 2 Barn. & Ald. 551; Broom's Commentaries on the Common Law, 8th ed., pp. 420—1. The delay has arisen through the death of the original sole plaintiff, and through poverty. Assuming there was a gift, the relation of solicitor and client existed at the time, and the gift was, therefore, ipso facto void. Miss Graham had no independent advice. As to the defendants' allegation, that on the 7th of June, 1880, Miss Graham signed or settled an account dealing with the application of the £5,000; the final arrangement as to the £1,000 kept in suspense was not made till July 23. The cases I rely on as showing that the gift, as a gift, cannot stand are the following:—Wright v. Proud, 13 Ves. 136; Tomson v. Judge, 3 W. R. 561, 3 Drew. 306 (where Kinderaley, V.C., held, though the circumstances were there particularly strong in favour of the solicitor, that the rule is absolute that a solicitor cannot take a gift from his client); Holman v. Loynes, 2 W. R. 205, 4 De G. M. & G. 270; Welles v. Middleton, 1 Cox, 112; Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 292; Morgan v. Minett, 25 W. R. 744, 6 Ch. D. 638. As to acquiescence, it must be pleaded, and is not. The relation, moreover, only ceased on March 15, 1882, and fourteen months later Mr. Tilley asserted Miss Graham's rights. In Allcard v. Skinner, 35 W. R. 424, ante, p. 251, 36 Ch. D. 145, there had been acquiescence for four or five years. In Mitchell v. Homfray, 29 W. R. 558, 8 Q. B. D. 587, the relation, which was that of doctor and patient, had ceased, and, moreover, the patient had received an annuity by way of consideration for the gifts.

He also referred to O'Brien v. Lewis, 11 W. R. 318.

Warmington, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the defendants.—There is no absolute prohibition of a gift from a client to a solicitor, nor does that relation differ from any other. This gift could be maintained even against the donor's wish, but in fact she did not wish, or attempt, to upset it. There was an election to abide by the gift: Mitchell v. Homfray; Cooke v. Lamotte, 15 Beav. 234; Rhodes v. Bate, 14 W. R. 292, L. R. 1 Ch. 252; Allcard v. Skinner. It would be absurd to say that you could make a gift after the relation had ceased, but could not confirm, after it had ceased, a gift made while it continued. Here, though the relation was severed shortly after the gift, the donor made no attempt during the remainder of her life to claim it back, but showed a contrary intention: Allcard v. Skinner.

Oswald, was not called upon to reply.

Kekewich, J.—My judgment is for the plaintiff. The case raises a question of considerable importance, but it is a question of law, not of fact. As regards the really material facts, with one exception there is no doubt at all. [His lordship stated the preliminary facts, and proceeded.] They were her solicitors, she paid them £1,000. Mr. Alsop knew perfectly well that the relation of solicitor and client existed at the time, that it continued to exist for some little time afterwards, and that he could not take, or keep, the money. It was kept. By his own evidence it appeared that the lady urged him to take it, and that he only consented to take it after being so urged. The relation of solicitor and client was closed shortly after the date of the gift. It was renewed afterwards for a time, and some further business seems to have been done between them, but that could not affect the question whether the gift was sound, or tenable, at the time it was made. At last the relation was finally severed. From the bill of costs I find that the last date was the 15th of March, 1882.

Between that date and the time of her death there was one very important interview between Mr. Alsop and Miss Graham, in April, 1883, and what took place at that interview was the only fact of importance as to which any doubt existed. She was then ill and in distress, and went to Mr. Alsop, not as a client, but to ask for a loan of £10. In the witness box Mr. Alsop and Mr. Paton, the cashier, were very reluctant to admit that Miss Graham was then ill, or that she was more so than usual, but the letter of the 5th of June, 1883, written to Mr. Tilley, makes it quite clear. She asked for a loan and it was granted. What more passed it is difficult to say. I do not doubt that Mr. Alsop and Mr. Paton, in their evidence, endeavoured to reproduce what really occurred, but Mr. Paton only tells us what Mr. Alsop told him in her presence what she had said. What it comes to is this—that the lady was aware that she might set up a claim for the £1,000, but that she said she did not intend to claim it, and that she intended to "adhere to" or "abide by" what she had done. It is impossible to rely satisfactorily on either of these expressions having been actually used, but I conclude the effect of what she said was of this kind—that she did not intend to yield to the advice that had been given her, to claim back the money. She had the loan of £10, and it does not seem to have been made conditional upon her not claiming the £1,000 back.

Shortly after this Amy Graham died.

To my mind the question I have to decide is whether, at the moment of her death, she was entitled to recover the money she had given. If she was, I think that her legal personal representative is entitled to do the same, and that the right has been kept alive by this action, notwithstanding the delay that has occurred. If, on the other hand, she was not so entitled, her personal representative cannot be in a better position. I know my decision may seem at first sight somewhat inconsistent with the language of Lord Selborne in Mitchell v. Homfray. But if his words are looked at carefully, and compared with the comments on that case of Lindley, L.J., in Allcard v. Skinner, I think it will be seen that the inconsistency is merely verbal and superficial. At any rate, I still think that this case depends upon the question whether Miss Graham could have claimed the money at her death or not.

The case of Mitchell v. Homfray came before the court under very special circumstances. It had been twice before a jury, and the facts had been found by the jury. The court was not well satisfied that the matter had been properly threshed out, but, rather than send the case back to a jury again, they accepted the findings of the jury, and the judgments proceeded entirely on those findings, which were that the relationship had come to an end long before the death of the testatrix, and that she had elected to abide by her gift. That was a case of physician and patient.

It is there stated (8 Q. B. D., at p. 588) that "in 1873 Mrs. Geldard ceased to live at Gainford and went to reside at Barnard Castle, about eight miles distant, where she continued to reside until her death, which happened in July, 1876. From the time that Mrs. Geldard went to reside at Barnard Castle the defendant ceased to act as her medical attendant," and between that time and her death, a period of more than three years, it was found by the jury that "she intentionally abode by what she had done," and the judgments went upon that ground. Lord Selborne said, at p. 591 (8 Q. B. D.):—"It must be held that, whether she knew or not that she had power to retract the gift, she was determined to abide by her acts; this is not a case of mere acquiescence; she determined that she would not undo what she had done. This being the state of facts, I do not think that any authority goes the length of saying that her representatives, after her death, can do that which, if she had lived, she herself would not have done." Baggallay, L.J., adopts the same principle, but puts it into his own language, and says nothing that assists me in understanding Lord Selborne's language. If I am to construe that language strictly, I might be forced here to say that Miss Graham would not, if she had lived, have tried to recover the money she gave to the defendants, and therefore that her personal representative cannot recover it. But I do not think Lord Selborne meant to say what his language, strictly construed, would imply, and Lindley, L.J., in Allcard v. Skinner, seems to have understood him in the same way as I do. Referring to Mitchell v. Homfray and other cases, he says:—"It is true that in those cases the donors had died; but it is clear, I think, that the decisions proceeded upon the ground that the donors, if alive, could not have obtained relief." He does not say "would," like Lord Selborne, but "could." As to Mitchell v. Homfray, he says:—"If the donor had been entitled when he died to have his gift set aside, his executors would have succeeded to his rights, and would have obtained the relief they sought." He puts it on the legal right, not on the intention.

Taking that view of Lord Selborne's meaning, which agrees with what I certainly understand the law to be, I have to decide whether Miss Graham could, if she had wished, have recovered this money at the time of her death. I think the law is stated accurately in Morgan v. Minett by Bacon, V.C., at the commencement of his judgment, where he says, 25 W. R., at p. 744, 6 Ch. D., at p. 645: "The law I take to be as plainly settled on the subject as any law existing in this country, that while the relation of solicitor and client subsists the solicitor cannot take a gift from his client." In order to sustain such a gift you must have something, after the confidential relation has ceased, amounting to a release of the client's right to set aside the gift. Now in this case nothing was done to release the claim, except the settlement or acceptance by Miss Graham of the bill of costs without insisting on her claim to the £1,000, and what passed at the interview on the 27th of April, 1883. As regards the first event, the fact of her not having put forward her claim has nothing of an active character about it, and is quite insufficient to release her rights, and, moreover, only a very short time had then elapsed since the gift was made. What took place at the interview of the 27th of April was much more important. She did then refer to the gift as something she meant to abide by; but supposing she had changed her mind the next day, would there have been any defence possible against a claim by her? All that the defendants could have said would have been, "You told us you were determined to adhere to your gift." I cannot doubt that such a defence could not be supported. There was nothing to prevent her changing her mind. What she had said was a mere declaration of what her intention was at the time, which it was quite open to her to change—it was no release, and it would have been impossible to set it up as a defence. It follows, if I am right in law, that the legal personal representative succeeded to her right of action, and that right having been kept alive by this action, he is entitled to succeed.

There must be judgment for payment of £1,000 within one month, with interest at not more than four per cent. from the date of the gift to the present time.

Oswald asked for costs on the higher scale, and referred to Davies v. Davies, 35 W. R. 697, ante, p. 86, 36 Ch. D. 359.

BLANK v. FOOTMAN, PRETTY, & Co. (a.)

Patent, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883—Prior publication—Section 51—Marking articles sold.

B. invented a trimming for corsets, which he showed to H., a commission agent employed by him on terms which gave H. an interest in the articles sold, to obtain his opinion as to whether the article would "take." H. showed the trimming to S., one of his largest customers, who suggested certain alterations; he also showed it to other customers, who ordered a certain quantity. This took place before the 23rd of November, 1885, when B. registered the article under the Act. The orders given were not executed until after registration.

Held, that, though there had not been previous publication of the design by showing the article to H., the communication of the design by H. to S. might amount—and the communication to the other customers certainly did amount—to previous publication.

A trimming was made up into packets containing each a large number of yards, and surrounded with a paper band having thereon "Rd." and the registered number of the pattern.

Held, that the article was properly marked within rule 32 issued under the Act.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, the registered proprietor of a design for corset trimming, registered by him under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), on the 23rd of November, 1885, and numbered 38521, for an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants and agents, from infringing the plaintiff's registered design, and in particular from imitating the same or causing the same to be imitated, and from selling or offering for sale such imitations as aforesaid; an account of profits or an inquiry as to damages.

The plaintiff complained that between the months of April, 1886, and July, 1887, at various times not known to him, the defendant had imitated his design and sold trimmings in accordance with it.

The defendants by their defence denied (1) that they had, knowingly or otherwise, infringed any legal right of the plaintiff; alleged (2) that the design in question had not been duly registered in accordance with the Act and the rules; (3) that the provisions of the Act and the rules with regard to the marking of each article to which a registered design has been applied before delivery on sale of such articles had not been duly complied with; (4) that the design was not, at the date of registration thereof, a new or original design not previously published in the United Kingdom; (5) that the design was not one capable of being registered within the meaning of the Act, and that the plaintiff was not the proprietor of the design within the meaning of the Act.

With regard to prior publication, it appeared that previous to November 23, 1885, the plaintiff had shown samples of the design in question to one Hummel, a commission agent, who had some interest in the design, for the purpose of obtaining his opinion as to whether the design would "catch on." Hummel took portions of the samples and showed them, in the manner stated in the judgment, to customers of his, and actually obtained orders from some of them for considerable quantities of the material, and they kept small portions of the samples, though it was not clear from the evidence whether the orders were given for immediate execution or not. The orders, in fact, were not executed until after the date of registration, when the trimming was sent to the customers in parcels of some dozens of yards each, each parcel having a paper band round it marked with the word "Rd." and the registered number of the pattern on it. The cardboard box containing these parcels was marked in a similar way.

Section 51 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, is as follows: "Before delivery on sale of any articles to which a registered design has been applied, the proprietor of the design shall cause each such article to be marked with the prescribed mark, or with the prescribed word or words, or figures, denoting that the design is registered; and if he fails to do so the copyright in the design shall cease, unless the proprietor shows that he took all proper steps to insure the marking of the article. Rule 32 issued under this Act is in the following terms: "Before the delivery on sale of any article to which a registered design has been applied, the proprietor of such design shall, if such article is included in any of the classes one to twelve in the third schedule hereto, cause each such article to be marked with the abbreviation 'Rd.' and the number appearing on the certificate of registration. . . ."

Aston, Q.C., Kennedy, Q.C., and Ashton Cross.— The point is whether there has been prior publication. The publication, such as it was, was accompanied by such circumstances of "confidentiality" as to prevent the protection afforded by the Act being lost.

Warmington, Q.C., and Carpmael, for the defendants. —The giving of a single order will constitute publication. In fact as long as the article gets into the possession for a beneficial purpose of another person that is publication. There was no "confidentiality" about the communication of these samples to customers of Hummel: The Germ Milling Co. v. Robinson, 3 Pat. Rep. 399. Then as to the marking, the mere marking of a piece of trimming is not sufficient, each article must be marked.

Aston, Q.C., in reply.—The question here is to what extent a confidential character can govern a publication. On this point Humpherson v. Syer, 4 Pat. Rep., pp. 184 and 407, is a useful guide. As to the point of marking, which is a subsidiary one, the marking need only be done in such a way as to guide the purchaser to the fact that the design has been so registered, and every separate inch of the trimming need not be marked. As to the main point, whether the design is new and original. To consult an expert in taste as to whether a design will "catch on," to use a trade term, is not publication.

KEKEWICH, J.—There is no occasion for me to decide, and I do not intend to decide, any question of morals; and fortunately, according to the view which I take of the case, there is no occasion for me to decide, and I do not intend to decide, any question of conflict of evidence. The plaintiff, through his agent in this country, Rudolph Blank, registered the design in question. The defendant has infringed that design—that is to say, he has made, manufactured, or sold an imitation of that design. He insists that he is entitled to do so, and that is the legal question which I have to decide on the facts. He is not so entitled if, as a matter of fact, this design was registered by Mr. Blank when it had not been previously published in the United Kingdom. So the question for decision resolves itself into this, Was the design previously published in the United Kingdom —previously, that is, to the 23rd of November, 1885, when it was registered?

Mr. Blank may be treated as a manufacturer in this country, though he is the agent of manufacturers in Germany. Mr. Hummel, the only representative, as I understand, of the firm, is a commission agent. He sells these goods and goods of this kind, and he has a bargain the terms of which have not been produced. I do not know whether it is in writing or whether it really rests on anything more than an understanding, but he has a bargain or understanding with Mr. Blank that he shall have the sole and exclusive right of selling goods of this class in the United Kingdom. Therefore Mr. Hummel has an interest in any design of Mr. Blank's in goods of this class, and though he is not a partner or in any way a partner he has that interest which makes him a person whom Mr. Blank would naturally consult before endeavouring to put any of that class of goods on the market. Mr. Blank, therefore, having sketched this design, shows it to Mr. Hummel. I cannot conceive that in doing so he would be publishing the design in any sense which could be placed on that word. Eventually, if that relation had not existed between the two parties, I see no reason why a designer should not call in an expert, a gentleman whom he knows to be experienced in the trade, likely to advise him well and whom he can trust, for the purpose of advising him before incurring further expense and trouble. I consider that Mr. Blank was only doing that which he was fairly entitled to do, the confidential character of the communication being a necessary incident of the relation between the two parties.

If it had stopped there one might have disposed of the case easily enough. But Mr. Blank was not content to stop there. Mr. Blank not only desired to get the full advice of Mr. Hummel, but he very naturally wished to ascertain, before he went any further, whether this was likely to take—that is to say, to find a market—and he certainly did intrust Mr. Hummel with the duty of soliciting orders and ascertaining from likely purchasers whether orders could be got for this design when it had been registered. Mr. Hummel accordingly consulted three different gentlemen, and I must deal with those three gentlemen in two classes. First there is Mr. Sewell. Mr. Sewell was Mr. Hummel's largest customer. He was a manufacturer who apparently purchased a large quantity of trimming of this kind and was well known to Mr. Hummel and was in constant communication with him. On the facts before me it appears Mr. Hummel showed this design to Mr. Sewell to get his advice and to ask him whether he would be prepared to give orders to be executed at a later period. He ascertained Mr. Sewell's views that the price, at that early date, was excessive, and no doubt there were other criticisms. Now Mr. Aston has cited to me, and I am content to take, the statement of Bowen, L.J., in Humpherson v. Syer as to what must be established in order to take a case of disclosure (I avoid the word publication) out of that publication which will destroy a patent or a design; Bowen, L.J., says: "I think when a man sends a patent to be made to a shop you must take what passes orally; you must take all the circumstances of the case and ask yourself whether there was any confidential relation established between the two parties—whether it was an implied term of the employment that the information should be kept by the shopman to himself, or whether he might afterwards, without any breach of good faith, use the matter, and use it as he chose." It is to be observed that that is applied by the Lord Justice, with reference to the facts of the particular case before him, to information given to a shopman who is going to manufacture. That is to say, the Lord Justice is dealing with a case where, from the very necessity of the thing, some other person must be employed. The patentee, whether it be a chemical patent or a scientific patent or a machinery patent, frequently (generally, I might say) is unable to carry out the manufacture of the patented article in all its details himself personally. He must employ others, and for that purpose the Lord Justice says he is entitled to do so without in the slightest degree damaging his patented rights to claim protection, provided it is done confidentially. It is a step further to say that a man like Mr. Blank is entitled to take into his confidence a man like Mr. Hummel, who is only a commission agent —a man through whom the profits are to be made. He does not occupy, to my mind, a position at all similar to that of the shopman. But I think it is only a fair stretch of the same principle to say, as I have already said, that I think a man in Mr. Blank's position might consult with those through whom he would put goods on the market, particularly, as I say, having regard to the relation existing between them, and, doing it confidentially, without avoiding his rights to be obtained by registration. But is Mr. Hummel, when consulted in that way, to be entitled to go on to Mr. Sewell, or any other person or number of persons, and still use the same confidence, a delegated confidence placed in him by Mr. Blank? I do not know where it is to stop. If Mr. Hummel may consult Mr. Sewell in confidence, Mr. Sewell, who is a very large manufacturer I am told, may consult many of the persons for whom he works, and so on to the end of the chapter. I see no limit to the confidence which might be thus placed in one person after another. However, nothing was done, as I understand the evidence, by Mr. Sewell in the way of actually giving an order until very much later, when the thing had been completed, and I do not think it necessary to decide this case, I will not say on the mere exhibition, but on the mere disclosure of these sample patterns by Mr. Hummel to Mr. Sewell.

The other cases go a step further still. Here again we have another delegation of confidence illustrating what I said just now—namely, that I really do not know where this confidence is to stop. Mr. Hummell, in the course of his business, goes down to Portsmouth, and out of five gentlemen whom he visits in the course of business he selects two to whom he may disclose this novelty which is to take so well with the public in the ensuing spring. He does not put it into his bundle of patterns, but keeps it in an envelope in his pocket, but with the intention of disclosing it to these two selected customers, and he does show it to them and they are taken by it. This is some time before the registration. These two selected customers were pleased with the article, and they at once ordered a considerable quantity. It is said on the one hand that the order was to be executed immediately; that it was an order, the execution of which was only delayed by the period necessary for the manufacture of the article. I do not think that is to be relied on very much. It was said on the other hand that it was not to be executed until the design had been registered. Without weighing the testimony as regards that, I am not disposed to make much of that point either. The fact remains that the order was given and the order was accepted and the order was in due course executed. These two gentleman had samples shown to them, and, more than that, they had samples handed to them and samples were kept by them, and though they, wishing to play an honest part and knowing that it was only given to them as selected customers, did not exhibit those samples in the meantime, but kept them in their drawer or in a book or pocket, yet I see no reason whatever if they had been disposed, I will not say to be dishonest, but to act badly towards Mr. Hummel, why they should not thereupon have registered the design themselves, or had, at any rate, some stuff manufactured according to the design. Upon what ground Mr. Blank, in such a case, could have come here for an injunction to prevent their action I fail to see. The answer to him would have been (and as far as I can at present see it would have been a conclusive answer), "You have put it into their power to do so by trusting Mr. Hummel. It is Mr. Hummel you must go against if he has committed a breach of confidence," and Mr. Hummel would have said, "By no means; I was told to get orders, and I have done it." They had these samples there, and how much they had remains a mystery and I suppose will.

I cannot understand myself what meaning to give to the words "previously published" if that is not publication. In truth, the only ground on which the want of publication has been argued is the question of confidence. The confidence I have already dealt with, and I need say no more about it. To my mind, even if there were no publication to Mr. Sewell, which I do not think it necessary to decide, though I am disposed to think there was, I think there was certainly a publication in Portsmouth, not once but twice, and from that time forward it was impossible for Mr. Blank to register this design. That seems to me to be entirely conformable to the policy of the Act. The Act is intended, as I understand it, to protect those clever and industrious people who spend their time and their brains and money on designing a pattern which may or may not prove successful, but, as a work of art, is entitled to protection in order that it may also become a work of profitable commerce. But I see no reason for applying that to the case of a man who prefers to take his chance with the public, and who says "I will design and I will spend time about it and money too when I am quite satisfied that I shall find a market." That is not, to my mind, at all within the policy of the Act. I think Mr. Blank, not unnaturally at all, has been attempting to avail himself of the provisions of the Act in order to get protection of that which the Act never intended to be protected. I think there was no novelty in the design at the time when he registered it—that is to say, that it had been then previously published in the United Kingdom.

That being my opinion I may deal shortly with the rest of the case. As regards the marking the real point is under section 51, whether Mr. Blank loses the benefit of his registration—that is to say, whether the copyright in his design has ceased because the different articles which have been sold in the market have not been marked with the prescribed mark; or, rather, it is pressed further than that—namely, whether the articles sold in the market to which the designed article is affixed have not been marked, because it has not been argued that the trimming itself ought to be marked, and it would be impossible, and it is admitted that it would be impossible, to say where and how often it should be marked. It is obvious you could not mark every quarter of an inch, and that even if you could do it you could not, in lace work like this, preserve the thing as a useful thing if you were to stamp it with marks. Therefore it is not suggested that ought to be done. It is said that every article to which it is affixed, however small the piece, ought in some way or other to show that it is a registered design. That, to my mind, is entirely a misconstruction of the 51st section. The Act may or may not go far enough, but the Act says that a mark is to be placed before delivery on sale of any articles to which a registered design is to be applied. The marking is to be caused to be done by the proprietor of the design. If the proprietor of the design does not sell these articles of dress to which the trimmings are affixed the section lays no liability upon him to mark those articles of dress. What is to be marked by him is the article to which a registered design has been applied—that is, the trimming. If he sells it in pieces of 144 yards he must mark the pieces of 144 yards. If, on the other hand, he sells small pieces—whether for patterns or for use—he must mark each small pattern, and mark in a way in which those things can be conveniently marked, by the tying on a label or by printing something on the packet in which it is. But he is not bound to mark anything but that which he sells.

I thought it right to express my opinion upon that, but on the greater question of publication or want of novelty I am in the defendants' favour, and there will be judgment for them and consequential relief.

THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF SOUTHAMPTON v. BELL & TAYLOR. (a.)

Practice—Solicitor—Costs—Poor rate—Solicitor and client—Taxation by clerk of the peace—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101), s. 39—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.

Section 39 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, which provides for taxation in certain cases by the clerk of the peace of the costs of a solicitor employed by a board of guardians, does not disentitle a solicitor to an order for taxation, as between solicitor and client, under section 37 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843.

Point of law raised by the pleadings.

Action for money had and received.

The plaintiffs, the guardians of the poor of Southampton, had advanced a sum of £600 to the defendants, their solicitors, for the purposes of an action. The latter delivered their bill of costs, and the plaintiffs applied to the clerk of the peace of Hampshire for taxation under section 39 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. The allocatur of the clerk of the peace taxed the bill down to £549 17s., and the costs of taxation amounted to £14 13s. 6d.

The plaintiffs now sought to recover the balance, after deducting the above amounts from the fund. In their statement of defence the defendants pleaded that they were not bound by a transaction under the Poor Law Amendment Act; that the alleged taxation was unreasonable and unfair; and that they were entitled to have their bill of costs taxed by a master of the High Court under section 37 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843.

P. Gye, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are bound by the taxation under section 39 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, which supersedes section 37 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843: Reg. v. Hunt, 6 E. & B. 408.

J. Alderson Foote, for the defendants.—Section 39 does not affect the defendants' right, as between solicitor and client, to have their costs taxed by a master of the High Court. It merely provides that the allowance by the clerk of the peace is "primâ facie evidence of the reasonableness of the charge, and is not evidence of its legality." The jurisdiction to tax conferred on the High Court by the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843, and the Judicature Act, 1873, can only be taken away by plain words: In re Worth, 29 W. R. 371.

P. Gye replied.

MANISTY, J.—I am of opinion that the provisions of the 39th section of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, have not the effect of disentitling the solicitor to taxation as between solicitor and client under the 37th section of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843. The disallowance made by the allocatur could not, I think, be disputed between the guardians and the ratepayers, notwithstanding some expressions in Reg. v. Hunt to the contrary; but as between the guardians and their solicitors the question would remain open, and the action could be maintained. The other construction involves the strange result that the solicitor to the board, and, I presume, also all other persons with whom the board deals, must wait for payment till after the audit has taken place. It is to be remembered, too, that the auditor cannot be supposed to have any knowledge of the principles on which the taxation of a solicitor's bill proceeds. The defendants are entitled to an order for taxation of their costs by a master under section 37 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843.

STEPHEN, J.—I agree. The object of section 39 is to prevent waste of the rates in useless expenditure, and is not intended to affect the liability of the guardians to their solicitors.

STEVENS v. BARNET DISTRICT GAS AND WATER CO. (a.)

Water rate—"Annual value"—"Annual rack rent or value"—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17), s. 68—Barnet Gas and Water Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. clxxxix.), s. 56.

The Barnet Gas and Water Act, 1872 (with which is incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847), provides (inter alia), section 56, "the company . . . shall furnish . . . a sufficient supply of water . . . at any rate, on the annual rack rental of the house or part of a house or premises supplied if the same be let at rack rent, and on the annual value if and while the same is not let at rack rent, not exceeding [so much].

Held, that "the annual rack rent" means the same as "the annual value," and does not mean "net annual value."

Case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49.

The appellant (Stevens) is the owner and occupier of a house and premises, Glebe House, Finchley, in the county of Middlesex.

The said house and premises are supplied with water by the Barnet District Gas and Water Co. (the respondents), who are a company incorporated under the provisions of the Barnet District Gas and Water Acts, 1872, 1883, and 1887.

By one of such special Acts, the Barnet Gas and

Water Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. clxxxix.), it is provided as follows :—

Section 56.—The company shall, at the request of the owner or occupier of any house or part of a house in any street in which any pipe of the company is or shall be laid, or on the application of any person who, under the provisions of this Act, is entitled to demand a supply of water for domestic purposes, furnish to such owner or occupier or other person a sufficient supply of water for domestic use at any rate, on the annual rack rent of the house or part of a house or premises supplied if the same be let at rack rent, and on the annual value if and while the same is not let at rack rent, not exceeding the following (that is to say) :—If the annual rack rent or value does not exceed £20, £6 per centum per annum on such annual rack rent or value; if the annual rack rent or value exceed £20 and do not exceed £30, £5 10s. per centum per annum on such annual rack rent or value; and if the annual rack rent or value exceed £30, £5 per centum per annum on such annual rack rent or value. Provided always that the company shall not be bound to supply any house, part of a house, or premises for any less sum than 5s. per annum. Provided also, that in the case of any house or part of a house or premises used in part as retail or wholesale shops or warerooms the said rates shall be charged (if the annual rack rental shall amount to more than £20 and shall not exceed £50) on three-fourths only of such annual rack rental (and if the annual rack rental shall amount to more than £50), upon two-thirds only of such annual rack rental.

By the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17), it is provided as follows :—

Section 68.—The water rates, except as hereinafter and in the special Act mentioned, shall be paid by and be recoverable from the person requiring, receiving, or using the supply of water, and shall be payable according to the annual value of the tenement supplied with water, and if any dispute arise as to such value the same shall be determined by two justices.

In December last the appellant preferred a complaint against the respondents, alleging that a dispute had arisen between him and the respondents, he being a person requiring, receiving, or using a supply of water from the respondents, as to the value of the premises so supplied with water, and that he required the annual value of the premises to be determined by two justices. The complaint was heard at petty sessions by the justices, and they fixed the annual value of the premises at £185.

The appellant was dissatisfied with this determination, and appealed.

Macmorran, for the appellant.—The premises are not let at an annual rack rent; therefore the water rate payable by the appellant ought to be assessed according to the "annual value" of the premises. The annual value mentioned in the special Act, the Barnet Gas and Water Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. clxxxix.) and in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17) is the "net annual value" as distinguished from the gross value or gross estimated rental. Such annual value should be determined upon principles similar to those adopted in fixing the rateable or net annual value for the purposes of the poor rate.

He cited Sheffield Waterworks Co. v. Bennett, 21 W. R. 74, L. R. 7 Ex. 409; Warrington Waterworks Co. v. Longshaw, 9 Q. B. D. 145, 30 W. R. Dig. 220; Bristol Waterworks Co. v. Wren, 15 Q. B. D. 637, 33 W. R. Dig. 239; and Dobbs v. Grand Junction Waterworks Co., 32 W. R. 433, 9 App. Cas. 55.

Finlay, Q.C., for the respondents.—The cases cited do not apply. The "annual value" mentioned in the statutes which have been referred to is the same as the annual rack rent—that is to say, the amount at which the premises may reasonably be expected to let from year to year, the tenant paying the usual tenant's rates and taxes and tithe commutation rent-charge (if any) and the landlord bearing the cost of repairs and insurance. The statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 60, (Income Tax Act) illustrates my meaning.

Macmorran replied.

Field, J.—This is a question of very great difficulty, for the Legislature, in a number of private Acts, has used in almost every case different words. Here we have a company or companies who undertake to supply the most necessary article of life, water, and they are confessedly industrial and commercial companies who only undertake to do the duty in consideration of a reasonable price for their article. Under ordinary commercial principles the price for the article would be that sum which, leaving a reasonable profit to the supplier, would be the market value of the article according to the quantity that is sold. A short three weeks ago every northern water company was in a state of terror as to what their condition would be in the month of August next, because it might turn out that they might have no water whatever to supply to their enormous number of customers. If it had been an ordinary commercial undertaking there can be no doubt whatever that the companies would have proceeded to raise their price at once. It is very difficult I quite agree, except you can proceed to charge by way of meter, to measure the amount used and charge for it accurately. If you charge by way of meter you measure your price according to the quantity of the article sold, but with a large population like that of London or Sheffield there are great difficulties in applying the principle of making the price according to the quantity. Therefore in lieu of that the Legislature has thought it right to regulate the prices according to the supposed wants of a house; and they estimate the supposed wants of a house by the rental which that house will fetch. They assume that a house with one room at a rental of one shilling a week will not consume so much water as a house with fifteen rooms let at £300 per annum. That is the theory. But it is absolutely unsound, because the quantity of water is by no means whatever in relation to the rental of a house. A house may command £1,000 a year in Grosvenor-square which would not command £300 a year in St. Giles's in the Fields, and therefore the thing is purely artificial; but it is convenient for the Legislature, and as the easiest means of ascertaining the rate a man ought to pay for his water they say, "we will take a graduated scale of a percentage upon" what? Now comes the difficulty. "Upon the annual value?" The words that we have to deal with here are, first of all, the language of the special Act, and, next, the language of the general Act. If we had only to look to the words of the general Act the words would be simply "annual value" and no more, but the general Act is not an effective Act of Parliament. Consolidation Acts have no force by themselves whatever, they apply to nobody and to nothing until the Legislature thinks it right to incorporate them in some special Act, and therefore in discussing the question we must look more to the special Act as governing the use of the words "annual value" in the general Act.

In discussing this question I shall take my last touch of the ground and I shall spring from the ground at Dobbs' case. I have had occasion to argue questions under these water company Acts and I have had occasion to decide them, but I really will not go back beyond the last point at which I am bound to acquire fresh force. I therefore spring from Dobbs' case. Starting from that point, it seems to me that the effect of the decision of the House of Lords is that, without anything more to qualify it, "annual value" means "net annual value," or in other words "rateable value," under the Parochial Assessments Act. If that is the effect of the judgment of the House of Lords, let us discuss it. It is quite true, as urged by the appellant, that two of the learned lords at least—Lord Bramwell and Lord Selborne—do say that they would have arrived at the same conclusion even if the first Act had not been repealed. I was of opinion that the first Act had not been repealed, and the Court of Appeal were of that opinion I believe, but the House of Lords, or some members of it, thought it was. Although we pay the greatest possible respect to the learned lords, their opinions are not binding unless they are the ratio decidendi of the decision. But if they are not we must use our own judgments with reference to them. Therefore I disseverate the opinions expressed by Lord Bramwell and Lord Selborne, and say that, as I understand it, the decision of the House of Lords is that the words "annual value" taken by themselves mean "net annual value." But then Lord Blackburn, Lord Watson, and I think Lord Bramwell, agree that in construing any Act of Parliament you must give effect to every word of it if you can. Therefore, if a private Act of Parliament said no more than this, "the Consolidation Act shall apply to this undertaking," then I should be bound to hold that "the annual value" meant what the House of Lords said it meant, but if I am to apply a private Act of Parliament which contains, as it does in this case, a particular section, I must give effect to that section.

Now section 56 of the private Act says that the rate shall be "at any rate on the annual rack rent of the house or part of a house supplied if the house be let at rack rent," and if that be not so, "on the annual value." Now the argument of the appellant of necessity involves that two different meanings must be put on two different branches—that in the one case the annual rack rent would mean A., and in the second case the annual value would mean B. I cannot think that such was the intention of the Legislature. What possible reason could there be for supplying water to A. at a certain rate because he had actually let the house to somebody else, and at a different rate because he is the owner and occupier of the house? I find from the context a reason for coming to the conclusion that in this case the annual rack rent is the same as "the annual value."

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is of very little use to look into the decisions on other Acts of Parliament, the words of which are not the same, or which are substantially different to the present one. In every case to which our attention has been called the words upon which the proceedings have gone have been so substantially different from what they are in the present case that no light is thrown upon the proper interpretation of the section of the private Act of Parliament by the interpretation that has been put on other Acts of Parliament in the several cases cited. Taking section 56 of the private Act in this case, which is the governing enactment, we find that the water rate is fixed at so much on the annual rack rent of a house if let at a rack rent, and on the annual value if not so let. It is impossible to suppose that a different measure of charge is to be put on the same house depending on whether or not it is let to a tenant. I think that the owner occupying himself must have been intended to be charged just the same as his tenant would have been, neither more nor less, and, inasmuch as where it is let there is no escaping from the test that is laid down by the Act—viz., that of the actual rack rent paid—it follows that you must put the same equivalent where the house is not let—that is to say, that you must read "annual value," not in its strict sense of "net annual value," but the kind of formal value which is equivalent in the case of a house not let to the annual rack rent of the house that is let. It is true that the 68th section of the Waterworks Clauses Act of 1847 is incorporated, and by that Act the water rates are to be payable according to the annual value simply; but then that is qualified that the water rates, "except as hereinafter and by the special Act mentioned, shall be paid" so-and-so. It is therefore clear that if there is an inconsistency between the two enactments that the general words were not meant to be of universal application, but give way to the special enactments which are directed to the particular case.

The decision of the House of Lords in Dobbs case really does not compel us to hold otherwise. The substance of that decision is that "annual value," when that expression is unqualified by anything else, means "net annual value." It that case it was a question whether it was qualified by anything else or not. The court said, quacunque via, the actual and formal meaning must be given to that expression, because, if there was any difference between the later Acts and the older Act, that older Act must give way, and if there was not they both meant the same thing. It is true there is an expression of opinion on the part of the court that they would have come to the same conclusion had the words in the former Act stood alone, but I must point out that these very words in the former Act are materially different from those in the present case. The order of the justices, therefore, will stand, and the costs of this appeal will be the respondents.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

In a suit where the petitioner proved charges of adultery against his wife, and the court pronounced a decree nisi for dissolution and condemned the co-respondent in costs, and the Queen's Proctor subsequently intervened but failed to establish his charges, the court, on a separate application, refused to condemn the co-respondent in the petitioner's costs of the Queen's Proctor's intervention.

Application to condemn the co-respondent to pay the petitioner's costs of an unsuccessful intervention by the Queen's Proctor.

In the suit by the husband, the wife and co-respondent pleaded connivance and conduct conducing to the adultery, but at the hearing before Butt, J., they offered no evidence in support of these issues, and the court pronounced a decree nisi with costs against the co-respondent.

The Queen's Proctor obtained leave to intervene, alleging connivance and suppression of material facts, but the intervention was dismissed by Butt, J., who heard the case, but he refused to condemn the Queen's Proctor in costs.

Deane, for the petitioner, in support of the application.—These are "costs of the proceedings" which by section 34 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the court has power to order the co-respondent to pay. The costs of an application to vary settlements has been held to be within those words: Gill v.

Gill and Hogg, 12 W. R. 808, 3 Sw. & Tr. 359. In Crawford v. Crawford and Dilke, 34 W. R. 677, the co-respondent had been dismissed from the suit, and therefore no analogy can be drawn from the refusal of the court to allow him to appear at the hearing of the intervention.

Clay, for the co-respondent.—The court has no power to award these costs. Section 34 cannot include costs of proceedings which could not have been taken at the date of that Act. The power of the Queen's Proctor to intervene is given by section 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, three years after the former Act.

Deane, in reply.—The same objection would apply to the costs incurred in an application for variation of settlement: see also 41 Vict. c. 19, s. 2.

BUTT, J.—In dismissing the Queen's Proctor's intervention in this case I observed that as it had been brought about mainly by the co-respondent he ought to pay the costs. The question now is, Have I the power to compel him to do so? I have only the power conferred by section 34 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which enables the court "to order the adulterer to pay the whole or any part of the costs of the proceedings." The penalty of paying the costs of an intervention by the Queen's Proctor could not then have been in the contemplation of the Legislature, for the power of the Queen's Proctor to intervene in the manner in which he now does was not then given. Ought I, then, to say that, although not given in the original Act, the effect of incorporating that Act in subsequent Acts is to give the court that power? I do not think I ought. The co-respondent does not appear in the proceedings arising out of the Queen's Proctor's intervention, and I infer that he has not the right to appear. I therefore think it would be unjust to condemn him in the costs of a proceeding over which he has and can have no control, although I regret it in this case. The application must be refused, but without costs.

DREW v. DREW. (a.)

Divorce—Desertion—Intention at time of leaving—Subsequent inability to return—Imprisonment.

Where a man leaves his wife under circumstances which would make his absence amount to desertion if continued for two years, the fact that he is subsequently arrested and imprisoned will not prevent the two years running.

A man who had been guilty of embezzlement left his wife in January, 1886, with the statement that he was going to Ireland for a week to shoot. He had been committing adultery with a woman and had arranged to take her to Constantinople. He, however, left for New South Wales, and when arrested was living with another woman. He was brought back in custody, tried, and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

Held, that he had been guilty of desertion.

Hearing before Hannen, P., of an undefended cause on the wife's petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of adultery and desertion.

The marriage took place in 1870, and the parties cohabited together in London and the neighbourhood till January 16, 1886, when the respondent left his wife, telling her he was going to Ireland for a week's shooting.

He had been guilty of embezzlement, and instead of going to Ireland he absconded to New South Wales, where he was subsequently arrested at Sydney by a detective officer and brought back to this country, where he was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

Prior to January, 1886, he had been in the habit of visiting and committing adultery with a woman, Theresa Schroeder, telling his wife that he had business out of town.

Before his flight he had proposed to Theresa Schroeder to go with him to Constantinople, and had provided her with an outfit which she marked with the name Adair, under which the respondent passed when he visited her, and he had also taken return tickets for the trip.

His wife received no communication from him after he left, and her letters to the address he had given in Ireland were returned, and she only learnt the truth as to his defalcations, &c., when she subsequently made inquiries from his father.

April 17.—Inderwick, Q.C., and Searle, for the petitioner.

HANNEN, P., directed that the case should stand over for the evidence of the respondent's father.

May 8.—The father was called, and stated that he had no knowledge of his son's intention to leave the country, and only heard of the offence and that he had left some days after he had gone.

HANNEN, P.—On the former occasion I stated that I had determined to act on the consideration of what were the circumstances at the time this man left his wife, and if these led me to the conclusion that he intended to desert her the fact that he was afterwards brought back to this country in the custody of the police and then committed to prison, and so unable to return to his wife, would make no difference, but desertion so begun would continue, notwithstanding the fact that his imprisonment would have prevented his return to her.

I have now to consider whether, when he parted with his wife on January 16, 1886, he intended to desert her, and in order to come to a conclusion on that point I must consider the whole of his conduct. Frequently we come to such a conclusion when we find that a man has cohabited with some other woman. In this case I must confess that when I adjourned the case the effect of the woman Theresa Schroeder's evidence was not present to my mind.

It is proved that the respondent told his wife a false story, that he was going to Ireland for a week to shoot. No doubt those whom he expected to be in pursuit of him would thus not be put on his track. But there is this fact also, that he proposed taking this woman away with him. The fact that he was fleeing from the pursuit of justice does not exclude the idea that he intended to desert his wife, and the fact that he made arrangements with this other woman to go with him moreover shows that he had that intention. He seems to have broken his promise with this woman, although she had made preparations for accompanying him. There is also the further evidence of the detective officer who arrested him in Australia, and who found him living with another woman there on affectionate terms. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that at the time he made preparations for flight he also intended to and did desert his wife. I therefore pronounce a decree nisi on the wife's petition, and give her the custody of the children.

Hearing before the court of the wife's petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of adultery and desertion.

On the 28th of October, 1887, the court had, on the wife's petition, filed on the 15th of July, 1887, pronounced a decree for restitution of conjugal rights, ordering the husband to comply with it within fourteen days from the service of the order. The order was served on the 2nd of November, but the husband never complied with it. The husband had committed adultery on the 7th and 8th of May, 1887.

The cause was undefended.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the ship Cromartyshire against the steamship Patroclus, and against the owners intervening as defendants.

Feb. 20.—The action was now heard before the President, assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

Hall, Q.C., and A. Thomas, for the plaintiffs.

Sir W. Phillimore, Q.C., and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants.

HANNEN, P.—I agree with Mr. Hall that article 11 does not prescribe any particular light to be shown by the overtaken ship to the overtaking vessel. It only requires that the former vessel shall show a white light or a flare-up light. But it is obvious that the light must be a sufficient light for the purposes of the article in question—viz., that it shall indicate to the overtaking vessel the position of the vessel on which it is exhibited. As to the light shown in this present case from the stern of The Cromartyshire—one of the binnacle lamps of that ship—I am of opinion that the lamp is capable of being made to give a light which might be sufficient, if all circumstances happened to concur favourably.

At the same time I must say that the Trinity brethren are of opinion that this is not in itself a proper light. The lamp is made for a purpose totally different to that for which it was used on the instant in this case, for it is constructed to throw the light down, and not forward. It is made to hang in a particular position, and not to be carried in the hand. If anyone holds it its tendency is to point downwards, and so the light might well not be seen at all, except for a few yards distance. If, on the other hand, it is held up so as to make the light show, then there is a tendency for the chimney to be out of the perpendicular and the glass to get smoked. Further, there is the small scope of light which is visible from it.

I have therefore to consider whether, on the present occasion, it was a sufficient light. I do not think from its unfavourable construction this lamp was burning sufficiently on this night and giving the warning which was required of it. On behalf of The Cromartyshire it is said they had seen the steamer approaching them, and that they had shown the light for a considerable time—as much as ten minutes. On the other hand, on the part of The Patroclus, it is said that this light, such as it was, was never seen until just before the collision, and I have therefore to consider whether or not it was not seen sooner on board The Patroclus by reason of their being a bad look out on that vessel, or whether it was not seen sooner owing to it not being shown or it not being a proper light. With regard to The Patroclus, the evidence of those on board her has not been shaken as to there having been a good look out on The Patroclus. I think Mr. Aspinall's argument is entitled to great attention when he suggests that the stern light of The Cromartyshire was not shown for ten minutes or any such long period, but that it was only shown, as those from on board The Patroclus say, at a very late period of the transaction. [His lordship stated his reasons for holding that this suggestion was borne out by the evidence, and proceeded:—] I consequently come to the conclusion that the stern light of The Cromartyshire was exhibited at too late a time, and was seen as soon as it could be by those on board The Patroclus.

As regards the light itself, I find that it might, in some circumstances, be an efficient light, but that it would be so by accident only. I hold The Cromartyshire alone to blame for this collision.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Ingledew, Ince, & Vachell.

Solicitors for the defendants, Thornely & Cameron.

ACCORD and SATISFACTION.—See CONTRACT, 1.

ACCOUNT:—

Acquiescence — Ratification. — Acquiescence and ratification must be founded on a full knowledge of all facts, and must relate to a transaction to which effect can be given by acquiescence and ratification.

The accounts on a bank in liquidation had been changed so as to represent the bank as a debtor in respect of a sum borrowed by the manager for his own purposes.

Held, that the doctrine of acquiescence and ratification by the liquidator could not render the bank liable for the debt.—Banque Jacques Cartier v. Banque De Montreal, P.C.—13 App. 111.

ADEMPTION.—See ADMINISTRATION, 1; WILL, 1—3.

ADMINISTRATION:—

1. Ademption—Life insurance policy—Lunacy—Payment of debt by committee.—A. bequeathed to his executors and trustees a policy of insurance on his own life in trust to pay two debts, and to pay the balance, if any, to B. A. paid one debt and became a lunatic. His committee paid the other debt.

Held, that B. was entitled to the proceeds of the policy after deducting the debt paid by the committee.—Larking v. Larking, CH.D. NOR., J.—37 Ch. D. 310; 57 L. J. Ch. 282.

2. Creditor—Pauper lunatic—Maintenance—Grant to guardians.—A. for six years preceding her death was supported as a pauper lunatic by the guardians of the L. Union. After her death it was discovered that she was entitled to an annuity from the National Debt Commissioners.

Held, that the guardians of the union were entitled to a grant of administration as creditors.—Lambeth Guardians v. Next of kin of Bradshaw, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 86.

3. Deficient estate—Charge on real estate—Back rents.—A. devised real estate to B., charged with the payment of a life annuity and of various legacies, to be paid, as to one moiety, at the expiration of six months after his decease, and, as to the other moiety, at the expiration of six months after the decease of the annuitant. B. became bankrupt, and the trustee of his estate entered into possession of the land. Arrears of the annuity and parts of the legacies remained unpaid. The land was sold, and the proceeds were insufficient to satisfy the arrears of the annuity and legacies.

Held, upon a motion by persons entitled to the arrears of the annuity and the legacies, that they were not entitled to have the back rents of the land applied in satisfaction of such arrears.—Allen v. Longstaffe, CH.D. NOR., J. 413—37 Ch. D. 48; 57 L. J. Ch. 420; 57 L. T. 848.

4. Discretion of court—Ord. 55, r. 10.—A testator's direction to his executors to have his estate administered by the court does not exclude the discretion of the court to refuse to make an order for administration; but the court will give weight to such a direction when considering whether an administration order should be made.—Jones v. Hawkins, C.A.—38 Ch. D. 319.

5. Intestacy — Distribution — Next of kin — Per stirpes or per capita—Statute of Distributions (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10), ss. 3, 5—7.—The testatrix, a widow, died intestate as to a share of her residuary personal estate, owing to the death of a legatee in her lifetime. She had only two children, a son and a daughter, both of whom died before her. Three children of the son and one child of the daughter survived the testatrix.

Held, that, under the Statute of Distributions, the grandchildren took the share per stirpes and not per capita.

In re Ross's Trusts, 20 W. R. 231, L. R. 13 Eq. 286, approved.—Walker v. Gammage, CH.D. NOR., J. 548—37 Ch. D. 517; 58 L. T. 722.

6. Intestacy—Marriage in Ireland—Divorce in India—Grant to next of kin.—Where a British subject married in the United Kingdom obtained a divorce from his wife in India, the court granted administration to his next of kin to the exclusion of the divorced wife.—In the Goods of Naves, P.D. & A.D. 528—57 L. J. P. D. & A. 19; 58 L. T. 529.

7. Mortgage — Trade debts — Locke King's Act Amendment Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 69), s. 1.—A. by his will directed his executors to appropriate the moneys to arise from certain policies on his life, in payment of his private debts, not being trade debts, and funeral and testamentary expenses, and bequeathed his residuary personalty, subject to the payment of his trade debts, which he declared should be a charge on his personal estate, to his son, and devised his real estate to his daughter. At the date of his death he owed a debt admitted to be a trade debt to his bankers, to secure which he had deposited the title deeds of his real estate.

Held, that the provision in the will as to the payment of trade debts amounted to a declaration of intention contrary to the rule established by Locke King's Act, and that the trade debt was payable out of the testator's personal estate, and not out of the real estate, the title deeds of which were deposited with the bankers to secure the debt.—Colston v. Roberts, CH.D. NOR., J. 663—37 Ch. D. 677.

8. Priority—Costs—Administration action—Probate action.—If the costs of a probate action are ordered to be paid out of the estate, and an administration action is afterwards instituted, and the estate is deficient, the costs of the probate action have priority next after the costs of the administration action and before any debts.—Kelly v. Kelly, M.R. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 243.

9. Priority—Crown debt—Principal and surety—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 5.—A surety who has paid a debt due to the Crown from his deceased principal debtor is entitled to stand in the place of the Crown, and to be admitted as a creditor of the estate of the principal debtor in priority to all other creditors.—Maxsidy v. Churchill, CH.D. NOR., J. 805.

10. Priority—Marshalling—Mortgage—Annuity—Exoneration of real estate—Will—Construction—Uncertainty—Locke King's Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113), s. 1.—A., by his will, after bequeathing £250 to his son B. and other legacies, directed that his trustees should, in the first place, pay out of his personal estate all his debts, including specialty debts, in full exoneration of the real estate. He gave to his wife an annuity for life, and six perpetual annuities to his daughter and five sons, to be first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth charges on the real estate, as well as two smaller annuities. He also bequeathed to his son H., if "by legislation or otherwise he shall lose his appointment, without any adequate retiring allowance," a perpetual annuity of £100, to be charged on the residuary estate. He gave his real and personal estate to the trustees, and directed it, within legal limits, to accumulate, and declared that it should, so far as might be necessary, with the consent in writing of his wife, or, after her death, at the discretion of the trustees, be applied "to meet contingencies which may be caused by vacancies, repairs, or casualties in my family." B. and M. were appointed executors and trustees. The real estate produced £660 a year, but was subject to two mortgages. It was more than enough to pay the annuities, if the mortgages were paid out of the personal estate, which was sufficient for the mortgages and other debts.

Held, (1) that the mortgages were payable primarily out of the mortgaged land; (2) that the annuities were charged on the real estate; (3) that the residuary gift was void for uncertainty, but the gift to H. was not void; (4) that Locke King's Act did not preclude the annuitant's right to have the assets marshalled. — Buckley v. Buckley, M.R. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 544.

11. Priority—Savings bank—Transfer to Bankruptcy Court—Savings Bank Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 87), s. 14—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 40, 125.—The provision of section 14 of the Savings Bank Act, 1863, by which a savings bank is enabled to obtain payment of a debt due to it from an officer of the bank in preference to the other creditors of the officer, is repealed by section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, so far as regards administration in bankruptcy, but not as regards the administration of an estate in the Chancery Division; and section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, does not incorporate the provisions of section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, into the rules of administration of an estate in the Chancery Division so as to take away such right of preference of a savings bank; and therefore, in the administration in the Chancery Division of the insolvent estate of an officer of a savings bank, the bank is entitled to payment of a debt in preference to the other creditors; but the court may, under section

125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, on the application of a creditor, order a transfer of the proceedings to the Court of Bankruptcy.—Jones v. Williams, CH.D. NOR., J. 34—36 Ch. D. 573; 57 L. J. Ch. 264; 57 L. T. 756.

12. Priority — Specialty creditor — Preference by executor.—An executor may pay a simple contract creditor in preference to a specialty creditor.—Drury v. Ormond, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 24.

13. Receiver—Originating summons.—In a creditor's administration action, commenced by originating summons, a receiver may be appointed immediately after service of the summons and before the order for administration.—Drake v. Franche, CH.D. NOR., J.—37 L. J. Ch. 437.

14. Revocation—Grant to creditor—Bankruptcy of administrator—Grant to next of kin.—Where a grant of administration had been made to a creditor, who, after satisfying his debt, became a bankrupt and absconded, the court revoked the grant without citing him, and made a fresh grant to the next of kin.—In the Goods of Bradshaw, P.D. & A.D. 848—57 L. J. P. D. & A. 36.

15. Will — Mortmain — Charity — Residue — Marshalling assets.—T. gave all her real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to convert and pay debts and legacies; she gave several legacies, and directed that they should, in the first instance, be payable out of her real and leasehold estate. She then directed her trustees to divide the residue into three equal parts between three charities, and provided "that the foregoing charitable legacies shall be paid exclusively out of such part of my pure personal estate as is legally applicable for that purpose." The testatrix left pure and impure personalty. The only real or leasehold estate she possessed was at Cape Town, and not subject to the Mortmain Acts.

Held, that the provision for payment of the charitable legacies was equivalent to a direction that the residue should consist of pure personalty; that it was a direction to marshal the assets in favour of the charities; and that the legacies must be paid out of the real estate at Cape Town, and the balance of the legacies and the debts and administration expenses must be paid out of the impure personalty, leaving the pure personalty for the charities.—Ravenscroft v. Workman, CH.D. KAY, J. 424—37 Ch. D. 637; 57 L. J. Ch. 682; 58 L. T. 469.

16. Will—Tenancy for life—Apportionment—Interest — Capital — Company — Shares — Bonus.—A. bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to B. upon trust to permit his wife to receive the interest, dividends, and annual income during her life, and subject thereto to B. absolutely. Part of the residuary estate consisted of shares in a company. The articles of association of the company provided that the directors might set aside out of the profits such sum as they thought proper as a reserved fund. After the death of the testator the directors distributed this reserved fund and certain other undivided profits to the shareholders as a bonus dividend, allotted at the same time new partly paid-up shares, and applied the bonus to the part payment of the new shares

Held, that the company did not pay or intend to pay any sum as dividend, but intended to and did appropriate the undivided profits dealt with as an increase of the capital stock in the concern; and that the bonus dividend was part of the capital of the testator's estate, and the tenant for life was not entitled thereto as being interest, dividend, or annual income.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (33 W. R. 621, 29 Ch. D. 635) reversed.—Bouch v. Sproule, H.L. 193—36 Ch. D. 385; 56 L. J. Ch. 1037; 57 L. T. 345.

17. Will annexed—Colonial law—British Guiana —Admistrator-General—Grant to attorney.—A., who was domiciled in British Guiana, and had property there and in England, by his will appointed two executors. By the law of British Guiana an executor is allowed a period of six months, which may be extended, from the death of his testator in which to deliberate whether he will act as executor or not, and during that period he may do certain acts and things necessary to protect the estate. One executor was resident in England, the other in the colony. The latter administered the estate on his own behalf and as attorney of the executor resident in England. Under the provisions of the law in force prior to the 1st of July, 1887, he ultimately nominated the Administrator-General of the colony to act as executor on his behalf, but did not affect the rights of the other executor.

The court made a grant of letters of administration, with the will annexed, to the attorneys in this country of the Administrator-General, until such time as he or the executor resident here should apply.—In the Goods of Black, P.D. & A.D. 400—13 P. D. 5; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 20.

18. Will annexed—Infant—No executor appointed —Grant to guardian.—A. by his will devised his property to his children, who at his death were minors, and directed that a trustee should be appointed by the court under the statutory powers in that behalf, and such trustee should also be executor, but that no relation of his should be so appointed.

The minors' relatives having been shown by affidavit to be undesirable persons to receive the grant, being persons unknown to the children, or living at a distance, or whose whereabouts were unknown, the court granted letters of administration, with the will annexed, for the use and benefit of the minors until one of them should attain the age of twenty-one, to a guardian elected by them without requiring notice of the motion to be served on their relatives.—In the Goods of Webb, P.D. & A.D. 847—13 P. D. 71; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 36; 58 L. T. 683.

1. Drug—Opium—British Pharmacopœia—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6—Pharmacy Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 121), s. 15—A man who sells tincture of opium which is not up to the standard laid down in the British Pharmacopœia is liable to be convicted of selling "a drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded" under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, although the purchaser did not specify any particular standard.—White v. Bywater, Q.B.D. 280—20 Q. ARBITRATION:—

1. Submission—Revocation—Misreception of evidence—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39.—Certain matters in dispute were referred to an arbitrator under a provision in a written contract. The arbitrator received evidence which was objected to as varying the written contract.

Held, that the court had power to give leave to revoke the submission to arbitration if the arbitrator had decided wrongly on a question of law which was within his jurisdiction.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed.—East and West India Dock Co. v. Kirk, H.L.—12 App. 738; 57 L. J. Q. B. 295.

2. Submission—Revocation—Stay of proceedings—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), s. 11.—An arbitration clause provided that any disputes which should arise between the parties should be referred to two arbitrators, who were named. A dispute having arisen, the defendant desired to proceed to arbitration; the plaintiffs nevertheless commenced an action against the defendant, and revoked their submission.

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to have the action stayed under section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, because, the submission having been revoked, there was no subsisting agreement to refer capable of being carried into effect.—Deutsche Springstoff Actien Gesellschaft v. Briscoe, Q.B.D. 557—20 Q. B. D. 177; 57 L. J. Q. B. 4.

3. Submission—Rule of court—Revocation—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 17.—A contract for the execution of certain works provided that any dispute arising thereunder should be referred to a particular arbitrator, and also that, so far as applicable, the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, should apply to the arbitration. Disputes arising under the contract were referred to arbitration by one of the parties, and thereupon the other party revoked the submission.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the clause in the contract applying the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, amounted to an agreement in the submission that the submission should be made a rule of court within 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39, and that the submission was not revocable at the will of either party.—In re Mitchell, C.A. 873.

4. Umpire — Appointment by arbitrators.—An arbitrator intrusted with the duty of appointing an umpire is not entitled to leave the appointment to chance.—Pescod v. Pescod, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 76.

5. Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 6, 22, 25, 27—Minerals—Compensation—Costs—Special case — Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 34.—The plaintiffs were lessees of a coal mine underlying land which the defendants had acquired for the construction of a reservoir under a special Act incorporating the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. The plaintiffs were working three seams of coal, and were preparing to work another, called the C. seam, and they gave notice to work the C. seam under, and within the limits of, the land of the defendants, who gave notice to treat for the purchase of one of the other seams. An arbitrator found that the working of the coal was not yet near enough to the reservoir for the mines to be exposed to risk from it, but that, assuming the defendants to purchase and retain only the working as to which they had given notice, the defendants would not get more than fifty per cent. of the C. coal, if they worked prudently without right of compensation.

Held (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that the arbitrator could not award compensation for the fifty per cent of C. coal which could not be obtained; and that the costs of a special case stated by the arbitrator were not costs incidental to the arbitration within section 34 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.—Holliday v. Mayor, &c., of Wakefield, C.A.—20 Q. B. D. 699.

ARTISANS' DWELLINGS ACT:—

Charging order—Notice — "Owner" —Artisans' Dwellings Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 130), ss. 3, 5, 7, 25.—In July, 1886, a notice was served by the M. Vestry, under sections 5 and 7 of the Artisans' Dwellings Act, 1868, upon H., notifying the report of the surveyor that certain houses were unfit for human habitation. H. at that date was lessee of the houses for a term which expired on the following Michaelmas Day, and was also assignee of a reversionary interest in the same for a lease of twenty-one years, to begin on the said Michaelmas Day. An order made on the report in October, 1886, was subsequently varied on appeal in January, 1887. Upon completion by H. of the works ordered, a charging order was made, on his application, upon the premises.

Held, that H. was, at the time when the notice was served, an "owner" within section 3 of the Act of 1868, as having a possessory interest in the premises for a term of more than twenty-one years; that the notice was properly served on him; and that the liability or benefits under the further proceedings accrued from the date of the notice, and not from the date of the order for the works.—Reg. v. Marylebone Vestry, Q.B.D. 271—20 Q. B. D. 415; 57 L. J. M. C. 9; 58 L. T. 180.

ATTACHMENT:—

1. Contempt of court—Barrister—False affidavits.—A., a barrister, who had been joined as a defendant, appeared as counsel for the defendants, and knowingly permitted false affidavits to be used.

Held, that A. was liable to attachment for contempt of court.—Linwood v. Andrews, ch.d. kay, j.—58 L. T. 612.

2. Contempt of court—Divorce suit—Advertisement—Evidence of adultery—Offer of reward.—A husband against whom a petition had been filed for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery and cruelty, and who had not made any counter-charge of adultery in his answer, printed and circulated in the neighbourhood where his wife was residing handbills offering in his own name a reward of £25 for "full particulars and legal evidence of the confinement of a certain young woman of a female child, supposed not registered," on or just before a certain date.

The court issued an attachment against the respondent for contempt of court.—Butler v. Butler—13 P. D. 73; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 42; 58 L. T. 563.

3. Contempt of court—Imprisonment—Terms of discharge.—In 1877 D. brought an action to recover certain houses, but it was decided that she had no title. She continued to assert her claim by legal proceedings; and an injunction was granted restraining her and her agents from further molesting the owner and tenants of the property. She made another attempt to take possession and was imprisoned for contempt of court. She refused to undertake to abandon her claim or to abstain from further efforts to take possession.

The court afterwards discharged her on the following terms:—The injunction was to last for the term held by the plaintiff; in case of a breach of the injunction the Official Solicitor, on the plaintiff's application, was to bring the offenders before the court and to enforce performance of the order, and the defendant was not to be allowed to issue any writ or make any application without leave of a judge at chambers.—In re Davies, q.b.d.—21 Q. B. D. 236.

4. Contempt of court—Solicitor—Judge's chambers.—After the hearing of an application before the judge in chambers, a solicitor who was engaged in the case, after the parties had left the judge's chambers and gone into the adjoining hall, began to call the solicitor for the other side foul and offensive names in connection with the proceedings before the judge, and continued doing so while going downstairs until they reached the entrance to the building, when he shook his fist in the other solicitor's face, though he did not actually strike him.

Held, that such conduct was an interference with the administration of justice in connection with the proceedings at chambers, and, as the judge in chambers was engaged in the exercise of his judicial functions as a judge of the High Court, was a contempt of the court of which the judge was the representative, and the court had power to commit for contempt.—In re Johnson, c.a. 51—20 Q. B. D. 68; 57 L. J. Q. B. 1; 58 L. T. 160.

5. County court—Contempt of court—Form of order—Uncertainty—County Court Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 113—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 89.—An order was made in an action in a county court upon H., as acting manager of a partnership fund, to pay into court within fourteen days the sum of £65 odd, and to deliver up certain documents. H. did deliver up the documents, but failed to pay in the money, whereupon an order of committal was made out by the county court judge, on the ground that H., in his fiduciary position, had been guilty of contempt of court by neglecting to obey the previous order. The committal order recited the terms of the original order, but did not specify any particular breach.

Held, that it was immaterial whether the process of committal was by an order of committal or a writ of attachment, since the distinction no longer exists in chancery practice, according to Harvey v. Harvey, 33 W. R. 76, 26 Ch. D. 644; but that the order was bad for uncertainty, since it did not specify in what particular H. was guilty of contempt, so as to enable him to purge his contempt.—Reg. v. Judge of Lambeth County Court, q.b.d. 475.

6. Garnishee order—Poor rates—Guardians—Discretion of judge.—An order will not be made against a board of guardians attaching poor rates due to them to satisfy a judgment for goods supplied to such guardians.—Murphy v. Belmullet Guardians, q.b.d. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 215.

7. Injunction—Service of order—Disobedience.—An attachment may be issued for breach of an injunction after service of the order, even if no writ of injunction has been actually issued.—Mining Co. of Ireland v. Delany, v.c. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 8.

8. Solicitor—Default—Receiving order—Discretion—Appeal—Debtors Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4, sub-section 4—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 10.—On an application for liberty to attach a solicitor for contempt in not paying a sum of money ordered to be paid by him where a receiving order in bankruptcy subsequently to such order had been made, North, J., held that he had jurisdiction to order such attachment to issue, but, in the exercise of his discretion under section 10 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, he refused the application, on the ground that no benefit could therefrom accrue to the applicants, and that the bankruptcy proceedings might be thereby embarrassed.

Held, that the Court of Appeal would not interfere with the discretion so exercised.—In re Wray, c.a. 67—36 Ch. D. 138; 56 L. J. Ch. 737; 56 L. J. Ch. 1106; 57 L. T. 605.

9. Solicitor — London agent — Debtors Act, 1869 s. 4, sub-sections 3, 4.—The defendant, who was a London agent for a country solicitor, made default in payment of a sum ordered to be paid by him in an action for an account by the country solicitor.

Held, that A. was liable to imprisonment under section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869, as a person acting in a fiduciary capacity, but not under section 4, sub-section 3, as a solicitor ordered to pay in his capacity of an officer of the court.—Litchfield v. Jones, ch.d. nor., j. 397—36 Ch. D. 530; 57 L. J. Ch. 100; 58 L. T. 20.

10. Trustee—Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4.—The remedy afforded by the Debtors Act, 1869, in respect of default by a trustee, is intended to be given only as between trustee and cestui que trust, and not for a creditor, where the person against whom the remedy is sought is not a trustee for the creditor.—London and County Banking Co. v. Firmin, ch.d. kay, j.—57 L. T. 45.

11. Trustee—Default—Discretion of judge—Ord. 42, r. 3—Ord. 44, r. 2—Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4, sub-section 3—Debtors Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 54), s. 1.—Section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869, only applies when default is made in payment, not of a mere ordinary debt but of a trust sum.

On an application, under ord. 44, r. 2, for leave to issue a writ of attachment against a trustee, to enforce a judgment for the payment of money, it is not necessary, in order to bring the case within section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869, to show that the trustee has been guilty of any fraud. Any default, even without fraud, made by a trustee in payment of any sum in his possession or under his control, which he has been ordered to pay, is sufficient to justify the court in making an order for attachment.

When a judge, on an application for leave to issue a writ of attachment against a trustee, makes an order for attachment in the exercise of the discretion given to him by the Debtors Act, 1878, the Court of Appeal will not interfere on the merits.

BANKER:—

1. Pledge—Negotiable instrument—Share certificates—Blank indorsement—Estoppel.—The executors of a holder of shares in an American railway company signed blank transfers indorsed on the share certificates, and handed them to their brokers, in order that the shares might be registered in the names of the executors. The brokers fraudulently deposited the certificates with their bankers as security for advances, and afterwards became bankrupt. According to American law the holder of certificates with transfers properly indorsed has a good legal title to the shares; and, according to mercantile usage in London, such certificates were treated as securities to bearer. The indorsement was not attested in the manner required by the railway company for registration.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to a declaration that the shares in question formed part of the testator's estate, and to delivery of the certificates by the bankers accordingly.

Judgment of Kekewich, J., reversed.—Williams v. Colonial Bank; Williams v. London Chartered Bank of Australia, C.A. 625—38 Ch. D. 388.

2. Pledge—Negotiable instrument—Transfer of stock.—A stockbroker obtained a loan from a bank of which he was a customer, on the security of a transfer of stock which was vested in himself and two other persons upon certain trusts, he being the acting trustee. He procured his co-trustee's execution of the deed of transfer by proposing to sell the stock and buy certain other stock instead. The transfer was expressed to be for a nominal consideration, and in favour of two persons named, who were trustees for the bank, and the bank believed that their customer was authorised by the transfer to pledge the stock to them. The customer subsequently paid off the loan, when the bank, instead of re-transferring the stock to the three former holders, without notice to them caused it to be transferred to buyers from their customer, and he received the price. He then bought therewith the other stock, as proposed to his co-trustees, but in his sole name. This he afterwards sold, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use. In an account which he delivered later to his co-trustees, he included this stock as part of the trust fund, and went on accounting to his cestui que trust for the dividends. He absconded and became bankrupt, and the co-trustees sought to make the bank liable for the original stock.

Held, that the bank, by allowing the purchase-money of the stock to get into the hands of the customer without the consent of his co-trustees, had occasioned the loss to the trust estate, and was liable to make it good.

Decision of Kay, J. (35 W. R. 752, 36 Ch. D. 25), affirmed.—Magnus v. Queensland National Bank, 577—37 Ch. D. 466; 57 L. J. Ch. 413; 58 L. T. 258.

3. Pledge—Re-pledge—Notice of title—Negotiable securities—Blank transfer.—S. gave to E., for the purpose of raising £26,000, certificates of railway stock, and bonds of foreign company, which were alleged to be negotiable securities. Blank transfers were executed by S. on all the documents, which E. handed to M., to secure £26,000 advanced by M. to E. M. deposited the documents, with other securities, with various bankers as security for current loans, the blanks in the transfers having been filled in with the names of nominees of the bank. The banks had notice that the documents might not belong to M. M. became bankrupt.

Held, that the banks were not holders for value without notice, and that S. was entitled to redeem all securities by repaying to the banks the amount advanced by M. to E.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 220, 34 Ch. D. 95) reversed.—Earl of Sheffield v. London Joint Stock Bank, H.L.—13 App. 333; 58 L. T. 735.

BANKRUPTCY:—

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—

1. Deed of assignment—Costs—Receiving order—Repayment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (a).—On the 20th of August, 1885, in pursuance of a resolution passed at a meeting of creditors, the debtor executed a deed of assignment vesting the estate in a trustee for their benefit. On the 28th of October, 1885, a petition was presented against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy alleged being the execution of the deed; and on the 31st of October the trustee under the deed paid out of moneys collected by him from the assets the sum of £20 7*s.* 8*d.* to a firm of solicitors, being the amount of their bill of costs incurred in connection with the meeting of creditors, and collecting certain book debts, and in preparing the deed of assignment. On the 20th of January, 1886, a receiving order was made against the debtor, and subsequently the trustee under the deed sent to the official receiver a cheque for the balance in his hands after deducting the amount paid to the solicitors, together with an account of receipts and payments in connection with the estate.

Held, that the trustee under the deed must refund the money so paid to the solicitors.—Ex parte Rawlings, In re Forster, Q.B.D., BANKY. 144.

2. Delivery of property—Fraud on creditor—Landlord and tenant—Rent—Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 58), s. 21.—In December, 1886, A., a farmer, was served with a writ for one year's rent due in the preceding September. His cattle were then sold by public auction for £117. Before being served with the writ he had paid £25 10*s.*, being six months' rent, less an abatement of forty per cent. which he claimed, to the trustee of an organisation called the "Plan of Campaign." On a bankruptcy petition by his landlord, A. was examined in the Court of Bankruptcy, when he admitted that he had put all his property out of reach of his landlord, and that he was unable to pay his creditors in full. He refused to state what he had done with the proceeds of the sale of his cattle.

Held, that A. had committed an act of bankruptcy within section 21 of the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act, 1872—In re Moroney, C.A. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 27.

APPEAL—

3. Discharge—Refusal—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 28, 104, 121—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 273.—Rule 273 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, by which it is provided that, in a small bankruptcy, no appeal shall lie from any order of the court except by leave of the court, does not apply in the case of an order made upon application by a bankrupt for his discharge.—Ex parte Rankin, In re Rankin, Q.B.D., BANKY. 526—20 Q. B. D. 341; 58 L. T. 120.

4. Examination of witness—Refusal to answer questions — Cross-examination — Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 27.—A witness who, on being examined under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is held by the registrar to be justified in refusing to answer questions put to him, cannot be made a respondent to an appeal by the trustee against such ruling of the registrar.

The answers of a witness examined under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, must in the end be accepted by the trustee, but he is not bound to accept the first answer, and may cross-examine the witness thereon.

Ex parte Rooke, 56 L. T. N. S. 579, 35 W. R. Dig. 18, explained.—Ex parte Tilly, In re Schraber, C.A. 388—20 Q. B. D. 518.

COMPOSITION—

5. Scheme—Approval—Discretion of court—Sale of assets—Assets abroad—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 18, sub-section 6.—A proposed scheme of arrangement between creditors and debtors who had assets in America, without the jurisdiction, provided, inter alia, that the American assets should be sold at rather more than their estimated value to one of the American partners, the only provision as to security being that the trustee in bankruptcy should insure the purchaser's life for about one-sixth of the purchase-money. The scheme was approved by the trustee, by the committee of inspection, consisting of creditors to a large amount, by the accountant employed by them to examine into the Chilian affairs, and by the official receiver.

Held, that the scheme ought to be approved as being reasonable and for the benefit of the general body of the creditors within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 18, sub-section 6.—Ex parte Smith, In re Staniar, Q.B.D., BANKY. 608—20 Q. B. D. 544; 58 L. T. 884.

6. Scheme — Approval — Judgment by consent — Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 18, 28, sub-section 6.—A scheme of arrangement providing that, "by consent of the debtor the trustee shall enter judgment against him for full amount of the debts, and that such judgment should have effect in like manner and to a like extent as though the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt," is to be disapproved, on the ground that such a provision is an attempt to incorporate the powers given to the court in the case of a judgment by consent under section 28, sub-section 6, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that the powers given to the court under such section are not authorised to be incorporated into schemes of arrangement under section 18.—Ex parte Bischoffsheim, In re Aylmer, C.A. 231—20 Q. B. D. 258; 57 L. J. Q. B. 168.

7. Scheme—Approval—Sale of assets—Specific performance—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 23, sub-section 2.—A trustee in bankruptcy entered into a written agreement with the defendants whereby it was agreed that the defendants should purchase from the trustee the estate of the bankrupt for such a sum as would pay the costs and expenses of the proceedings and the preferential debts, and a certain composition to the unsecured creditors, and that, upon the approval of the scheme by the court, the bankruptcy should be annulled.

At a first meeting of the creditors a resolution was passed, which was subsequently confirmed at the second meeting by the statutory majority, to accept the offer of the defendants to purchase the estate on the terms of the agreement, provided that the defendants gave a bond to the trustee to secure the payment of the purchase-money. The court afterwards made an order approving of the purchase upon the terms contained in the agreement between the trustee and the defendants, and annulled the bankruptcy. The trustee sued for specific performance of the agreement.

Held, that the agreement could not be specifically enforced against the defendants, they never having consented to the provision relating to the bond, and the agreement which they had entered into with the trustee never having been accepted by the creditors.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.—Lucas v. Martin, C.A. 627—37 Ch. D. 595; 57 L. J. Ch. 261; 58 L. T. 889.

DISCHARGE—

8. Condition — Entering judgment — Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 28, sub-section 6.—The court will not require a bankrupt, as a condition of his discharge, to consent to judgment being entered against him for the balance of his debts, unless there is some evidence that he is likely to acquire property sufficient to satisfy such judgment.

Quære, whether a man who has one creditor only can present a debtor's petition and obtain a complete discharge.—Ex parte Arnaud, In re Bullen, C.A. 886.

9. Disqualification — Certificate — Conviction for libel—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 32.—A. was convicted of libel, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment, with hard labour, and ordered to pay the costs of the prosecution. A. borrowed on a bill of sale to pay the costs of his defence, and on conviction borrowed on a second bill of sale to pay off the former one, and to meet further costs. The prosecution caused his bankruptcy, and he was disqualified from exercising the office of vestryman.

Held, that the bankruptcy was not caused by misfortune without any misconduct within section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.—Ex parte Burgess, In re Burgess, Q.B.D., BANKY.—57 L. T. 200.

10. Disqualification— Certificate— Costs— Divorce suit—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 32, sub-section 2 (b).—In a suit for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's alleged adultery, the jury found that the wife had not committed adultery, and the petition was dismissed. In consequence of the costs incurred in these proceedings the petitioner was adjudicated bankrupt. The bankrupt, having obtained an immediate unconditional order of discharge, applied, under section 32, sub-section 2 (b), for a certificate that "his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune, without any misconduct on his part."

Held, that the certificate must be refused, as the bankruptcy was not caused by "misfortune," the bankruptcy being solely caused by the costs incurred in the divorce proceedings which the bankrupt had commenced of his own free will, and which were under his complete control.—In re Campbell, C.A. 582—20 Q. B. D. 816.

EXECUTION—

11. Interpleader—Petition—Notice to sheriff—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 45, sub-sections 1, 2; s. 46, sub-section 2.—On an application for trial of an interpleader issue respecting goods taken in execution under a judgment for a sum not exceeding £20, an order was made directing that, in the event of the non-compliance of the claimant with certain provisions, the goods should be sold by the sheriff and the proceeds paid into court pending the result of the trial. The claimant made default, and the goods were accordingly sold and the proceeds paid into court. Notice of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against the debtor was served on the sheriff within fourteen days of the sale, and the debtor was adjudged bankrupt on that petition.

Held, that, under sections 45 and 46 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled, as against the execution creditor, to the money in court.—Heathcote v. Livesley, Q.B.D. 127—19 Q. B. D. 485; 56 L. J. Q. B. 645.

12. Petition—Notice to sheriff—Retention of proceeds—Time—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 46, sub-section 2.—The fourteen days during which the sheriff is required, by section 46, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to retain in his hands the proceeds of goods sold under an execution commence to run from the time of the sale, and not from the time of the receipt of such proceeds by the sheriff.—Ex parte Ross, In re Cripps, Q.B.D., BANKY. 845.

13. Sheriff—Costs of execution—Cutting and threshing corn—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 46, sub-section 1.—After goods of a debtor had been taken in execution, a receiving order was made against him, and the sheriff delivered the goods to the official receiver under section 46, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. On taxing the costs of the execution, certain expenses incurred whilst the sheriff was in possession for cutting, carrying, and threshing corn were disallowed by the county court registrar, but were allowed by the judge.

Held, that the expenses in question were not costs of the execution within the meaning of section 46, sub-section 1, and were properly disallowed on taxation.—Ex parte Condor, In re Woodham, Q.B.D., BANKY. 526—20 Q. B. D. 40; 57 L. J. Q. B. 46; 58 L. T. 116.

FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE—

14. Composition deed—Secret agreement.—By a composition deed the creditors of H., in consideration of the payment of the composition, agreed to release to H. all debts owing from him to them respectively, on condition that, if H. made default in payment of the composition, the deed should be void. P., one of the creditors, at the time of executing the deed, made a secret bargain with H., by which he was to receive from H. a larger proportion of his debt than any of the other creditors. H. having made default in paying the composition, P. presented a bankruptcy petition against him. The registrar refused to make a receiving order.

Held, that the effect of the secret bargain was that the release of P.'s debt was absolute and the condition void, and that the refusal of the registrar to make a receiving order was right.—Ex parte Phillips, In re Harvey, C.A. 567.

15 Payment for benefit of surety—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 48.—A payment to a creditor by a debtor immediately before his bankruptcy, not with the object of preferring the creditor, but with the object of benefiting the debtor's surety, is not void against the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy.—Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Mills, C.A.—58 L. T. 871.

JURISDICTION—

16. Costs—Security—Appeal—Proof—Rejection—Bankruptcy Rules, 1880, rr. 131, 143.—Where the proof of a creditor resident abroad is rejected by the trustee in bankruptcy, and such creditor appeals from the rejection, the court have no jurisdiction to order him to give security for the costs of such appeal.—Ex parte Izard, In re Vanderhaage, Q.B.D., BANKY. 525—20 Q. B. D. 148; 58 L. T. 236.

NOTICE IN BANKRUPTCY—

17. Judgment—Company—Liquidator—Calls—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1.—The official liquidator of a company obtained judgment against A. for calls, and issued a notice in bankruptcy against A. in his own name as liquidator.

Held, that the notice in bankruptcy was irregular.—Ex parte Mackay, In re Shirley, Q.B.D., BANKY.—58 L. T. 237.

18. Judgment—Costs—Chancery Division—Dismissal of action—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1.—An order had been obtained by the defendant for the dismissal of an action for the recovery of land, a declaration of title, and mesne profits for want of prosecution and for the payment of costs.

Held, that the order was not a "final judgment" within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon which the defendant was entitled to serve the plaintiff with a bankruptcy notice.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 36 W. R. 304, 20 Q. B. D. 318) affirmed.—Ex parte Earl of Strathmore, In re Riddell, C.A. 532—20 Q. B. D. 512; 57 L. J. Q. B. 259; 58 L. T. 838.

19. Judgment—Divorce—Alimony pendente lite—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1 (g).—An order against a husband for the payment of alimony pendente lite is not a "final judgment" within sub-section 1 (g) of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon which a bankruptcy notice can be founded in respect of arrears payable thereunder.—Ex parte Henderson, In re Henderson, C.A. 567—20 Q. 20. Judgment—Garnishee order—Stay of execution—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1—Ord. 42, rr. 22, 23.—If a creditor has obtained final judgment, and a garnishee order absolute has been made against the judgment debtor, execution on the judgment must be stayed so long as the garnishee order is undischarged, and the creditor is not entitled to serve a notice in bankruptcy on the garnishee, even if the debt in respect of which the garnishee order was made has been paid.—Ex parte Hyde, In re Connan, C.A.—20 Q. B. D. 690; 57 L. J. Q. B. 472.

21. Judgment—Mortgage—Foreclosure—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1 (g)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 139.—A creditor who, as equitable mortgagee, has obtained a foreclosure decree and an order for sale of the property of the debtor is still, if no such sale is found to be possible, at liberty to serve a bankruptcy notice on the debtor, and to take further proceedings; and the fact of such an order for sale not having been carried out is not sufficient ground for an adjournment by the registrar of further proceedings on the notice on the application of the debtor under rule 139 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886.—Ex parte Meston, In re Kelday, C.A. 585.

OFFICIAL RECEIVER—

23. Fees—Disclaimer—Joinder of respondents.—Where an application is made to the court by the official receiver as trustee in a bankruptcy, he is not exempt from the payment of the fee of five shillings prescribed by the scale of fees and percentages.

In an application to disclaim property against a landlord, any number of mortgagees or sub-lessees who are interested in parts only of the property sought to be disclaimed may be joined, but different landlords of separate and distinct estates cannot be joined as respondents to one application for leave to disclaim the aggregate property.—Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Whitaker, Q.B.D., BANKY. 736 — 21 Q. B. D. 261.

ORDER AND DISPOSITION—

24. Reputed ownership—Custom—Agistment.—The custom of agistment is notorious, and therefore no reputation of ownership can arise in respect of horses or cattle grazing, by agreement, upon the land of a farmer.—In re Burke, BANKY. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 564.

PETITION—

25. Abuse of process—Purchase of debt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 4, 6.—It is not an abuse of the process of the Bankruptcy Court for one creditor, whose debt may be insufficient to found bankruptcy proceedings, to purchase the debt of another creditor in order to found such proceedings bonâ fide for the purpose of preserving the estate of the debtor and of having it administered according to the bankruptcy laws.—Ex parte Baker, In re Baker, Q.B.D., BANKY. 553—58 L. T. 233.

26. Costs—Abortive execution—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 6.—The costs of an abortive execution cannot be added to a judgment debt so as to make up the amount necessary to enable a creditor to petition under section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.—Ex parte Cuddiford, In re Long, C.A. 346—57 L. J. Q. B. 560; 58 L. T. 664.

27. Dismissal—Substitution of petitioning creditors—Jurisdiction—Practice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 104, 107.—A bankruptcy petition was dismissed by a county court registrar, on the ground that the petitioning creditor, by assenting to a deed of assignment previously executed by the debtor, was prevented from alleging the deed as an act of bankruptcy, but the order of the registrar was rescinded by the county court judge, who made an order substituting other creditors, who had not assented to the deed as petitioning creditors, the three months during which the deed could be relied upon as an act of bankruptcy having then expired.

Held, that the county court judge had no authority to rescind the order made by the registrar; that the order made by him substituting other petitioning creditors was not warranted by any section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that, even if the county court judge had power to make the order, he ought not to have exercised it.—Ex parte Maughan, In re Maughan, Q.B.D., BANKY. 846—21 Q. B. D. 21.

PROOF—

28. Composition deed—Covenant—Release—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 4, 43.—A composition deed executed by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors provided that "in consideration of the premises," the creditors parties to the deed would "release the debtor from all claims and demands against him." The debtor was adjudicated bankrupt on the petition of a creditor who had not been a party to the deed.

Held, that a creditor who was a party to the deed was entitled to prove in the bankruptcy, as the deed was only a release conditional upon its remaining valid.—Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Stephenson, Q.B.D., BANKY. 624—20 Q. B. D. 540; 57 L. J. Q. B. 451; 58 L. T. 589.

29. Contingent liability — Lease — Covenant — Repairs—Assignment—Indemnity—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), ss. 31, 49.—The assignee of a lease for a term of years covenanted to indemnify the lessees against damages for breach of their covenants to repair. Eight years before the term expired the assignee filed a liquidation petition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and obtained an order of discharge. The lessees were not included in the debtor's statement, and they received no notice of liquidation, and did not prove as creditors. After the term expired the lessors recovered damages from the lessees upon the covenants to repair.

Held, that the lessees' right of action against the assignee was barred by the order of discharge.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal (35 W. R. 588, 18 Q. B. D. 646) affirmed.—Hardy v. Fothergill, H.L.—13 App. 351.

30. Priority—Local board—District rate—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 211, sub-section (3)—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 40, sub-section 1 (a).—On the 12th of January, 1887, at the time of filing his petition, the bankrupt was tenant of a house under a lease for twenty-one years. The trustee in the bankruptcy did not disclaim, but on the 1st of February, 1887, he sold his interest in the lease, the bankrupt remaining in occupation as tenant under the purchaser. There was due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order a local board rate made on the 8th of October, 1886, for the half-year from the 30th of September, 1886, to the 25th of March, 1887, and payable in advance.

Held, that the estate of the bankrupt was liable to pay the rate for the half-year.—Ex parte Ystradfodwg Local Board, In re Thomas, Q.B.D., BANKY. 143—57 L. J. Q. B. 39.

31. Reduction—Application for benefit of bankrupt—Abuse of process—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, schedule 2, r. 25.—At the hearing of an application by one creditor in the bankruptcy to reduce or expunge the proof of another creditor, the preliminary objection was taken that such application, although made in the name of the creditor, was in reality for the benefit and on behalf of the bankrupt.

Held, that the application must be dismissed.—Ex parte Rooney, In re Tallerman, Q.B.D., BANKY. 864.

RECEIVING ORDER—

32. Divorce suit — Alimony — Judgment summons—Committal—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 103, sub-section 5.—An order for alimony pendente lite, and a subsequent order for permanent alimony, were made in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division. The sum of £130 being due under the orders, a judgment summons in respect thereof was issued by the wife.

Held, that a receiving order in lieu of a committal could not be made by the court against the husband under section 103, sub-section 5, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, but that the wife was entitled to come to the court under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and that an order directing payment by monthly instalments of £10 should be made.—Ex parte Otway, In re Otway, Q.B.D., BANKY. 698—58 L. T. 885.

33. Husband and wife—Joint petition—Separate receiving orders—Rescission—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 8.—A receiving order was made against a husband and wife upon their joint petition, but, the official receiver having discovered that they had not traded jointly or in partnership, the petition was subsequently amended to that effect, and a separate receiving order was made against each of the debtors. Objection was taken by the Board of Trade to the two receiving orders being made upon a joint petition, it being shown that the husband had no assets, and had acted only as manager in the wife's business.

Held, that the official receiver had a locus standi to apply to the court to rescind the receiving order against the husband, and that it was the duty of the court to rescind the order.— Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Bond, Q.B.D., BANKY. 700.—21 Q. B. D. 17; 58 L. T. 887.

34. Stay of proceedings—Action after receiving order—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 9, 10.—On the 24th of October, 1885, a receiving order was made against A. on his own petition. B. afterwards commenced an action against A. on the balance of an account.

Held, that the action must be stayed.—Brownscombe v. Fair, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 85.

TRUSTEE—

35. Appointment—Objection—Board of Trade—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 21.—A deed of assignment was executed by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors, under which a trustee was appointed, who dealt with the estate. A bankruptcy petition was afterwards presented against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy alleged being the execution of the deed, and the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt. The trustee under the deed was appointed by the creditors the trustee in the bankruptcy, but the appointment was objected to by the Board of Trade, on the ground that his connection with the bankrupt's estate made it difficult for him to act with impartiality in the interest of the creditors generally.

Held, that the objection was right, and must be sustained.—Ex parte Board of Trade, In re Martin, Q.B.D., BANKY. 698.—21 Q. B. D. 29; 57 L. J. Q. B. 384; 58 L. T. 889.

36. Assets—Garnishee—Judge's order by consent—Debtors Act, 1869, s. 27.—S. having given a consent to judgment being signed against him by C. & H., judgment was signed by them, but the consent was not filed as required by section 27 of the Debtors Act, 1869. Y., who was a debtor of S., paid money to C. & H., under a garnishee order obtained under the judgment. S. subsequently became bankrupt, and his trustee in bankruptcy applied to the court for an order that C. & H. should pay to him the sum of money so received from Y.

Held, that the effect of non-compliance with the requirements of the section was that the money was paid by Y. to C. & H. to the use of the trustee, who was entitled to recover it from them.—Ex parte Brown, In re Smith, C.A. 403—20 Q. B. D. 321; 57 L. J. Q. B. 212.

37. Assets—Married woman—Separate estate—Separate trading—Settlement—Life interest—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1, sub-section 5; s. 19.—A married woman who traded separately from her husband was adjudicated bankrupt in respect of her separate property pursuant to section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Under her marriage settlement she was entitled to a life estate in certain property for her separate use, but without any restraint on anticipation.

Held (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that the life estate vested in the trustee in bankruptcy, as the claim of the trustee did not "interfere with or affect the settlement" within the meaning of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the trustee claiming under and not against the settlement.—Ex parte Boyd, In re Armstrong, C.A. 772—21 Q. B. D. 264.

38. Disclaimer — Crown property — Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 55, 150.—The provisions of section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, are binding upon the Crown, and a trustee in bankruptcy is entitled under that section to disclaim a bankrupt's interest in property held by him from the Crown.—Ex parte Commissioners of Woods and Forests, In re Thomas, Q.B.D., BANKY. 735.

39. Disclaimer—Lease—Mortgage—Vesting order—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 55.—Leave having been given to a trustee in bankruptcy to disclaim the bankrupt's interest in certain leases, it was ordered, on the application of the landlord, that, unless the executor of a mortgagee by sub-demise of the bankrupt's interest should, within seven days, elect to accept an order vesting in him the disclaimed property, subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the leases, he should be excluded from all interest in and security upon the property.

Held, that the court had power to make the order on the application of the landlord, and that, subject to a formal amendment, the order made was right.—Ex parte Shilson, In re Cock, Q.B.D., BANKY. 187—20 Q. B. D. 343; 57 L. J. Q. B. 169; 58 L. T. 566.

40. Prosecution of debtor—Debtor's petition—Debtors Act, 1869, s. 11, sub-sections 13—15; s. 16—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 149, 163.—The court cannot order the prosecution of a bankrupt under section 16 of the Debtors Act, 1869, in respect of offences alleged to have been committed under section 11, sub-sections 13, 14, and 15, of the said Act within four months next before the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, where such petition has been presented by the bankrupt himself.—Ex parte Wood, In re Burden, Q.B.D., BANKY. 896—21 Q. B. D 24.

41. Removal—Meeting—Injunction—Jurisdiction—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 65, 72, 83.—Sections 65 and 72 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, empower the court to restrain the creditors from holding a meeting called to consider the removal of the trustee of a liquidating debtor till after the decision of a question as to expunging a creditor's proof.—Ex parte Sayer, In re Mansel, C.A.—19 Q. B. D. 679; 56 L. J. Q. B. 605.

42. Title—Relation back—Composition—Adjudication—Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 126.—Where the creditors of a debtor have resolved to accept a composition under section 126 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and the debtor is subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt under the last clause of that section, there is no relation back of the trustee's title to the act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor in filing his petition, so as to invalidate a payment made by him between the filing of the petition and the adjudication of bankruptcy.—Ex parte McDermott, In re McHenry, C.A. 725.

BASTARDY:—

Affiliation order—Summons—Service—Last place of abode—Bastardy Law Amendment Act, 1873 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 4.—L. resided at Sunbury from September, 1886, until the 20th of April, 1887, when he went to Southampton. He returned to Sunbury on the 14th of May, and on the 19th of May he sailed from Southampton to the West Indies. On the 19th

BILL of EXCHANGE:

Dishonour abroad — Damages — Interest — Re-exchange—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 57.—A bill of exchange drawn in South Australia, by a banking company carrying on business in South Australia and in England, for acceptance in England by their English branch bank, was dishonoured when presented in England.

Held, on a claim by the holder to prove in the winding up of the company in England for interest on the amount of the bill, at the rate of ten per cent. (the Australian rate of interest), that the claim for interest was wrong, and that the only remedy of the holder was by way of damages for the amount payable for re-exchange.

BILL of SALE:—

1. After-acquired property — Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 4, 5, 9.—By a bill of sale the grantor assigned as security for the payment of money the chattels specifically described in the schedule thereto annexed, "together with all other chattels and things the property of the mortgagor now in and about the said premises, and also all chattels and things which may, at any time during the continuance of the security, be in or about the same or any other premises of the mortgagor to which the said chattels or things or any part thereof may have been removed, whether brought there in substitution for, or renewal of, or in addition to, the chattels and things hereby assigned."

Held, that the bill of sale was void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule.

The rule of construction laid down in Ex parte Stanford, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 257, is the test of what constitutes substantial divergence from the statutory form.

2. Assignment of other than personal chattels—Partial invalidity—Divisibility—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 4, 5—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 9.—A bill of sale not made in accordance with the statutory form purported to assign, along with personal chattels, certain machinery, being property other than personal chattels.

Held, that, as the legal part of the security could be severed from the illegal, the security was good as to the machinery.

Davies v. Rees, 34 W. R. 573, 17 Q. B. D. 408, distinguished.—Ex parte Byrne, In re Burdett, C.A. 345—20 Q. B. D. 310; 57 L. J. Q. B. 263; 58 L. T. 710.

3. Covenant—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 7.—A bill of sale contained a covenant that the grantor would keep insured and in repair the chattels assigned, provided that, if default were made by the grantor, the grantee might insure and repair and enter for that purpose on the premises where the chattels were stored, the expenses so incurred, with interest at five per cent., to be a charge on the chattels; and it was further agreed that it should be lawful for the grantee to seize upon the happening of any of the events mentioned in the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 7.

Held, that the bill of sale was good.—Topley v. Crosbie, Q.B.D. 352—20 Q. B. D. 350; 57 L. J. Q. B. 271; 58 L. T. 342.

4. Covenant—Rates and taxes—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, ss. 7, 9.—A bill of sale contained a covenant for payment by the grantor of all rates, taxes, and outgoings in respect of the premises, in default of which the grantor should pay the same and charge the amount to the grantor, and all expenses to which he might be put, which sums should be "added to and form part of" the security. The bill contained a power to seize for the causes mentioned in section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Held, that the bill of sale was invalid.—Macey v. Gilbert, Q.B.D.—57 L. J. Q. B. 461.

5. Covenant — Rents, rates, and taxes—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 7.—By a bill of sale the mortgagor undertook to pay all rent and other outgoings of the premises on which the goods assigned might be. It was further provided that, in default of such payment within seven days after it became due, the mortgagees might pay any rent, rates, taxes, and outgoings then due, and that all sums so paid by the mortgagees, with interest thereon, should be charged upon the goods assigned, and be recoverable in the same manner as the principal moneys and interest secured by the bill of sale.

Held, that the bill of sale was void, as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Bianchi v. Offord, 17 Q. B. D. 484, 35 W. R. Dig. 27, approved.

6. Inventory—Schedule—Pictures—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 4.—A bill of sale which purported to assign pictures described them in the schedule as so many oil paintings and so many water-colours in gilt frames.

Held, that the bill of sale was void in respect of the pictures for non-compliance with section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, which requires that the schedule shall contain "an inventory," and that the chattels comprised in it shall be "specifically described."

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (35 W. R. 761, 19 Q. B. D. 276) affirmed.—Witt v. Banner, C.A. 115—20 Q. B. D. 114; 57 L. J. Q. B. 141; 58 L. T. 34.

7. Pledge—Constructive delivery—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, ss. 3, 4—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, ss. 8, 9.—In order to make a valid pledge, it is not necessary for delivery of possession to be contemporaneous with the advance of the money, but it is sufficient if the money is advanced on a contract that the goods shall be delivered and the goods are in fact afterwards handed over under the contract. Until the goods are so handed over there is no valid pledge, delivery being an essential part of a pledge.

Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N. C. 136, followed.

Where there is a valid pledge, the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882, have no application, although a document regulating the rights of the parties may have been subsequently executed.

The handing over of the key of a warehouse or room must, in order to amount to constructive delivery of goods stored in the warehouse or room, be made under such circumstances that it in fact passes full control over the goods.

A. agreed to advance money to B. on the security of goods to be deposited in a room of which A. was to have control. B. hired a room, deposited the goods in it, and placed a key of it at the disposal of C., who was also employed by B. to make a list of the goods in the room, which list was apparently to some extent intended for the convenience or benefit of A. On the day the goods were deposited B. wrote to A. to inform him of the deposit and the proposed list, and added that C. "has the key, which I place entirely at your disposal."

Held, that there was a good constructive delivery of possession of the goods to A., notwithstanding the fact that B. subsequently continued to have access to the room, and exercised various acts of control over the goods. — Hilton v. Tucker, CH.D. KEK., J. 762.

8. Promissory note—Collateral security—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 9.— The defendant gave the plaintiffs a bill of sale to secure the repayment of a loan, with interest, and at the same time signed a promissory note for payment of the same sum and interest by similar instalments payable at the same dates. The note provided that, if any instalment was unpaid, the whole amount should be payable.

Held, that, though the bill of sale was void, the plaintiffs could recover on the promissory note.—Monetary Advance Co. v. Cater, Q.B.D.—20 Q. B. D. 785; 57 L. J. Q. B. 463.

9. Promissory note—Defeasance—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, sub-section 3—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 8.—By a bill of sale given as security for an advance the grantor covenanted to repay the principal sum with interest by equal monthly instalments until the whole sum advanced, together with the interest thereon, should be fully paid. The bill of sale was drawn in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and was duly registered. At the same time, and as part of the same transaction, the grantor gave to the grantee a separate promissory note for the same amount as that in respect of which the bill of sale was given, payable by the same instalments at the same dates, with a stipulation that in case of default in payment of any one instalment the whole sum remaining unpaid should become due and payable.

Held, that the promissory note operated as a defeasance of the bill of sale, as, in the event of the full amount of the promissory note becoming payable and being paid, the bill of sale would be defeated; and that the registration of the bill of sale was void under section 10, sub-section 3, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and the bill of sale was also void.—Counsell v. London and Westminster Loan and Discount Co., C.A. 53—56 L. J. Q. B. 622.

10. Receipt—Oral agreement—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 4.—By an oral agreement the title to a personal chattel was given as security for an advance. The grantor afterwards signed a receipt, which was not intended to embody, and did not embody, such agreement. The receipt was not registered under the Bills of Sale Acts.

Held, that the Bills of Sale Acts did not apply, since the title of the grantee to the chattel depended, not on the receipt, but on the oral agreement.—Newlove v. Shrewsbury, C.A. 835—21 Q. B. D. 41.

11. Registration—Affidavit—Covenant—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 7, sub-section 4.—The production, at the hearing of an interpleader issue, of a bill of sale, together with a certificate of registration, is no evidence that the proper affidavit was also filed in accordance with the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, but the proper course is to adjourn the hearing for the production of evidence, and not hold the bill of sale void merely on this ground.

A bill of sale contained an unqualified covenant by the grantor to produce receipts for rent, without the addition of words corresponding to the words "without reasonable excuse" in section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882; but contained a proviso that the chattels assigned should not be liable to seizure by the grantee for any cause other than those specified in section 7.

Held, that the insertion of the covenant did not render the bill of sale void as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.—Turner v. Culpan, Q.B.D. 278—58 L. T. 340.

12. Registration—Affidavit—Omission—Rectification of register—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 14.—Under section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, a judge has no power to order an affidavit to be filed to supply particulars inadvertently omitted when the affidavit was filed, and the power given by section 14 of extending the time for registration will not be exercised after the title to the goods has actually vested in an execution creditor who has seized them.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 36 W. R. 669, 20 Q. B. D. 535) affirmed.—Crow v. Cummings, C.A. 808.

13. Registration — Company—Debentures—Agreement to issue—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 17.—A "debenture" is a document which either creates or acknowledges a debt.

By a memorandum of agreement a company agreed to pay to a person who had advanced money to the company the sum of £600, with interest, and charged certain hereditaments with the repayment of the £600 and interest, and further agreed with the lender that the company would, at any time during the continuance of the security, at the request of the lender, execute a legal mortgage, and, further, to issue debentures of the company to the extent of £600, secured over the capital, stock, goods, chattels, and effects of the company, including uncalled capital present and future.

Held, that the agreement was a debenture and within section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act of 1882.

Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co., 35 W. R. 798, 36 Ch. D. 215, followed.—Levy v. Abermorris Slate and Slab Co., CH.D. CHI., J. 411—37 Ch. D. 260; 57 L. J. Ch. 202; 58 L. T. 218.

14. Registration—Company—Debentures—Mortgage—Fixtures—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, ss. 4, 5, 8—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 17.—The effect of section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, is to prevent the articles which by it are excluded from the definition of "trade machinery" from being "personal chattels" for any of the purposes of the Act, and therefore a mortgage of them does not require registration.

A coal and brickmaking company deposited title deeds to certain beds of coal and fireclay with bankers, together with a memorandum, which stated that the deposit was made to secure to the bankers "payment of all sums of money which we are now, or at any time hereafter may be, indebted to you, whether on current account for principal, interest, commission, and charges, or on any other account whatsoever." The memorandum contained an agreement to execute a legal mortgage of the property when required, but it did not contain any acknowledgment of a debt, or any covenant or agreement by the company for payment.

Semble, that the memorandum was not a "debenture" within the meaning of section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.—Topham v. Greenside Glazed Fire Brick Co., CH.D. NOR., J., 464—37 Ch. D. 283; 57 L. J. Ch. 583; 58 L. T. 274.

15. Registration—Description of grantor—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10.—The Christian name of the grantor of a bill of sale was wrongly described for the purpose of concealing the fact that he had given a bill of sale.

Held, that the misdescription did not render the registration of the bill invalid.—Downs v. Salmon, Q.B.D. 810—20 Q. B. D. 775; 57 L. J. Q. B. 454.

16. Registration—Description of grantor—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10.—The grantor of a bill of sale was described in the bill of sale and in the affidavit filed on registration as "Kendrick Turner, tutor." His real name was Frederick Henry Turner, and he was a schoolmaster.

Held, that the bill of sale was void.—Lee v. Tyler, Q.B.D.—20 Q. B. D. 773.

17. Registration—Mortgage—Lien—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, ss. 4, 5—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, ss. 8, 9.—A banking company agreed to sell a paper mill and machinery to the L. Co. for £20,000, payable by instalments. The premises were to be conveyed on payment of the two first instalments, the L. Co. executing a mortgage for the balance, with power to the mortgagees, if the business of the L. Co. should be suspended, to re-enter and take possession of the premises, and everything built or placed thereon, and not requiring registration under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and to hold the same for their own use and benefit, without prejudice to the L. Co.'s liability for the balance of the purchase-money. The agreement was not registered as a bill of sale. Two instalments were paid, but no conveyance or mortgage was executed. The L. Co. took possession till it was wound up, when the mortgagees re-entered.

Held, (1) that the mortgagees had no lien for the balance of the purchase-money; (2) that the agreement to mortgage did not affect any property requiring registration under the Bills of Sale Acts.—In re London and Lancashire Paper Mills Co., CH.D. NOR., J.—58 L. T. 798.

18. Registration—Mortgage—Machinery—Power of sale—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, ss. 3, 5, 7—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 6, sub-section 2; s. 19.—A mortgagor by deed conveyed, "as beneficial owner," by way of mortgage, a piece of land, "with the dwelling-house and buildings thereon erected," to the mortgagee in fee. The mortgage deed provided that the power of sale given by section 19 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, was to apply, but otherwise contained no express power of sale. The buildings in part consisted of a workshop, in which was affixed "trade machinery" of the kind declared by the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, to be "personal chattels," but this trade machinery was not separately assigned or specially mentioned at all in the mortgage.

Held, that the mortgagee was, by the instrument of mortgage, entitled to the possession of the trade machinery merely as part of the freehold, and that he was not entitled—either by the terms of the instrument itself or by the power to sell "the mortgaged property or any part thereof, either together or in lots," conferred by section 19 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881—to seize, sever, or sell the trade machinery apart from the land, and therefore that the instrument was not, within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, a bill of sale as regards the trade machinery, and did not require to be registered.

W. bought a stack of hay at a sale by auction. The auctioneer's clerk signed A.'s name as purchaser in the auctioneer's book, which was signed by the auctioneer, and specified the lot and the price, with a copy of the conditions of sale. No part of the price was paid, one of the conditions of sale giving the purchaser six months' credit, and the hay remained in the apparent possession of the vendor. The entry in the auctioneer's book was not registered as a bill of sale, and the hay was seized in execution by a judgment creditor of the vendor.

Held, that the memorandum in the auctioneer's book was within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and was void for want of registration.—Evans v. Roberts, CH.D. KAY, J.—36 Ch. D. 196; 56 L. J. Ch. 952.

BUILDING SOCIETY:—

1. Arbitration—Stay of proceedings—Dispute—Building Societies Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 41), s. 2.—A building society sued the directors and secretary to recover money received by them in their fiduciary capacity. The rules of the society provided for reference to arbitration of any "dispute arising between the society and any members."

Held, that the plaintiffs were not bound to proceed to arbitration, and that the action ought not to be stayed.—Municipal Permanent Building Society v. Richards, CH.D. STI., J.—53 L. T. 931.

1a. Arbitration—Dispute—Withdrawing member—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 34—Building Societies Act, 1884, s. 2.—The rules of a building society provided that a member might, by notice in writing, withdraw, and be entitled, "provided there shall be sufficient funds available," to receive within the month after the notice, or earlier if the directors should think fit, the subscriptions paid on his shares, also that the directors should have power to determine all matters of dispute between the society and any member, and that, if the member should be dissatisfied with their decision, the matter should be referred to arbitration. W., a member of the society, gave notice of withdrawal. The society declined to pay back his subscriptions on the ground that they had not enough funds in hands, which W. denied.

Held, that the dispute must be referred to arbitration.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.—Walker v. General Mutual Building Society, C.A.—36 Ch. D. 777; 57 L. T. 574.

2. Ultrà vires—Borrowing—Compromise—Estoppel.—W. lent money to a building society, which had no borrowing powers, on the promissory notes of the directors. His representative demanded repayment of the amount, but eventually agreed to refrain from proceedings, the directors giving him a loan certificate under seal of the society for the sum advanced. After the loan and before the demand for repayment the society obtained borrowing powers. The society was wound up, and the representative of W. claimed to rank as a creditor against the assets of the society.

Held, that the society was not estopped from disputing the claim; that no compromise had been established; that the transaction with the representative of W., being in fact an advance to pay off an invalid claim, was illegal; and that W.'s claim must be disallowed.—In re Sheffield Permanent Building Society, Ex parte Watson, Q.B.D. 829—21 Q. B. D. 301.

3. Ultrà vires—Borrowing—Repayment to trustees.—The rules of a building society provided that when £100 for every share, with all costs and other expenses, should have been fully paid, the society was to be terminated, and the trustees were to indorse a receipt on the mortgage deeds, and deliver them to the members. Certain advanced members sued the trustees, to redeem their mortgages, on the ground that their monthly instalments had all been paid, all unadvanced members had been paid, there was no valid subsisting debt or liability, and the society had terminated. There was no power for the trustees to borrow, but the defendants, with the assent of the plaintiffs and other members of the society, borrowed money for the purposes of the society.

Held, that if any officer of the society had made any payments for which the society was liable, there not being any money of the society out of which the payments could be made, he was entitled to stand in the place of the payee, and to make a claim on the society in respect of his payments.—Owen v. Roberts, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 81.

5. Winding up—Appeal—Incorporation after order—Building Societies Act, 1874, ss. 4, 32.—An order was made in the Lancaster Palatine Court for the compulsory winding up of an unincorporated building society, and notice of appeal was given. After the notice of appeal the society was incorporated.

Held, that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal.—In re Old Swan and West Derby Benefit Building Society, Ex parte Evatt, C.A.—57 L. T. 381.

6. Withdrawal of deposit—Dividend.—The plaintiff was the holder of £250 paid-up shares in a building society, and in March, 1887, he withdrew half that amount. On the 15th of July, 1887, the directors apportioned to the paid-up shares an interim dividend of five per cent. per annum for the half-year ending on the 30th of June, but refused to pay any interest on the amount withdrawn by the plaintiff.

Held, that the defendant was entitled to a dividend on the £125 withdrawn from the date of the last dividend to the date of the withdrawal.—Perratt v. London Scottish Permanent Building Society, Q.B.D.—59 L. T. 31.

The plaintiff having placed on the grave a small stand with flowers on it, covered by a glass shade and wire frame,

Held, that, under section 33 of the Burial Act, 1852, the plaintiff was not entitled to place these things upon the grave, and that the burial board could remove them under the general power of control over the cemetery vested in them by section 38.

The property was conveyed from time to time to new trustees for the benefit of the said parish, and the vicar was chosen by the parishioners. The Charity Commissioners included the advowson in the schedule of ecclesiastical charity property under the City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883, and the parishioners presented a petition asking that it might be removed from the schedule, on the ground that it was not "charity property."

Held, that an advowson is not an exception to the general law as to charitable trusts, and that the advowson was "charity property."—In re St. Stephen, Coleman-street, In re St. Mary, Aldermanbury, CH.D. KAY, J. 837.

2. Church — "Reparations and ornaments" — Spire.—The objects to which the funds of a charity were applicable were "the reparations, ornaments, and other necessary occasions of the parish church of Stoke Newington." COMMON:—

Inclosure—Allotments—Turf common—Private Act—Charitable trust.—By a local Inclosure Act commissioners were required to allot to the lords of the manors, "in trust for the occupiers for the time being of all such cottages and tenements containing less than one acre each as were erected on ancient sites or have now been erected more than fourteen years, in lieu of their rights or pretended rights of cutting turves," so much of the waste grounds as the commissioners should think proper for a turf common, to be managed and the turf arising therefrom to be taken and used by the occupiers of such cottages in such manner as the lords of the manors and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor acting within each manor should appoint. In pursuance of the Act the commissioners allotted land for a turf common. A portion of the land was taken by a railway company, and the purchase-money was paid into court.

Held, (1) that the lord of the manor was entitled to so much of the fund in court as represented the value of the soil of the land taken by the railway company; (2) that the trust was for the benefit of the occupiers for the time being of the cottages, and not a trust for the owners, who were only entitled to the addition to the value of the occupation caused by the gift of the right to the occupiers; (3) that the trust in favour of the occupiers was a charitable and not a private trust.

COMPANY:—

CALLS—

1. Forfeiture—Director—Estoppel—Interest.—The articles of association of a company provided that there should be not less than three directors nor more than seven, who were to have power to make calls. Any casual vacancy on the board was to be filled up by the directors, and any member whose shares had been declared forfeited was to be liable for all calls previously owing, with interest. A. was a shareholder and director. On the 7th of November, 1882, the directors made a call of £1 per share, payable on the 1st of December. Some of the directors resigned, and on the 19th of December only A. and one other director were left. On that day the directors elected three more directors, and the five directors passed a resolution that all shareholders who did not pay the call by the 31st of December should forfeit their shares. The board made a second call, payable on the 20th of January, 1883. At a meeting of the five directors, A. being in the chair, it was resolved that the shares on which the first call had not been paid should be forfeited. The defendant had not paid the call.

Held, that, though the resolution declaring a forfeiture of shares was invalid, A. was estopped from disputing his liability; and that he was liable for the first call with interest, and for the second call without interest.—Faure Electric Accumulator Co v. Phillipps, C.A.D.—58 L. T. 525.

2. Forfeiture — Misrepresentation — Injunction. — A shareholder having commenced an action against a company for rescission of his share contract, on the ground of misrepresentation, paid into court the sum demanded for unpaid calls, and moved to restrain the company from declaring the shares forfeited.

The court dismissed the motion with costs, holding that the proper course was for the plaintiff to pay the money to the company without prejudice to any question.—Ripley v. Paper Bottle Co., CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 327.

CAPITAL—

3. Distribution — Paid-up stock — Partly-paid shares.—The capital of a railway company comprised stock consisting of £20 shares which had been fully paid up, and of £20 shares upon which £5 only had been paid. The company had, under the Act incorporating it, power to call up the amount unpaid on the shares, but had never done so. The Government of India purchased the undertaking of the company under statutory provisions, and an action was brought to determine the manner in which the purchase-money was to be distributed amongst the stockholders and shareholders respectively. Dividends were payable to the shareholders in accordance with the provisions of the 120th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which was incorporated in the Acts governing the company.

Held, that the holders of partly-paid shares and holders of stock were entitled to have the purchase-money divided between them rateably in proportion to the amounts paid by them respectively, so that each holder of £20 stock would receive four times as much as each holder of a £20 share on which £5 had been paid.

4. Distribution — Surplus — Preference shares — Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 109, 133, sub-sections 1, 9.—Section 133, sub-section 1, of the Companies Act, 1862, must be construed together with section 109, and therefore the meaning to be attributed to section 133, sub-section 1, is not that the surplus assets are divisible per share, but that the liquidator under that section, or the court under section 109, is to divide the surplus assets among the parties entitled thereto.

The articles of a company incorporated under the Act of 1862 provided that new capital might be created by the issue of new shares carrying such preferential right to dividend, or such priority in the distribution of assets, or subject to such postponement of dividend, or in the distribution of assets, as the company might by special resolution direct, but "save as specified in any such resolution, all new capital shall be subject to the same provisions in all respects as if it had been part of the original capital"; and that the net profits of each year should belong to the holders of shares, and be divided pro ratâ upon the whole paid-up share capital of the company, and that a dividend might be declared payable thereout on the shares in proportion to the amounts paid up thereon. New capital was created by the company by the issue of new preference shares, entitling the holders thereof "to a dividend after the rate of five per cent. per annum upon the amount for the time being called up thereon, and taking precedence of . . . . all dividends and claims of the holders of ordinary shares in the company," but the company did not exercise, in respect of the new shares, any of the other powers given to it by the articles. Each preference share so issued was of £10, and the whole amount on each preference share had been paid up; each ordinary share was also of £10, but only £3 10*s.* thereon had been paid up when the company was wound up. The whole undertaking of the company was sold under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, and the company was wound up voluntarily. The purchase-money paid for the undertaking of the company gave a large surplus after payment of all liabilities of the company, and after the return of their capital to the shareholders.

Held, on a summons taken out by the liquidator, that this surplus was to be divided among all the preference and ordinary shareholders in proportion to the sums paid up on their shares, and not according to profits.

5. Reduction—Ultrà vires—Issue of shares at discount —Companies Act, 1862, s. 161—Companies Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), ss. 3, 4.—In pursuance of a special resolution passed by a company in liquidation the liquidator agreed to sell the property of the company to a new company, part of the consideration being the issue to each shareholder of the old company of one share of £1 in the new company, with 15*s.* credited as paid up thereon, in exchange for each fully paid-up share of £1 in the old company held by such shareholder, and that the remaining 5*s.* per share should be payable by the allottee in the manner provided by the agreement. The whole of the shares in the new company were issued to shareholders in the old company as provided by the agreement, prior to which a contract providing for their being issued in that manner was filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies. The remaining 5*s.* per share was afterwards paid up on all the shares. The capital of the company was afterwards increased by a sum of £500,000, divided in 500,000 shares of £1 each, of which 50,000 were issued as fully paid up as the consideration for the purchase of other property by the company. The company afterwards passed a special resolution for reducing the capital by cancelling paid-up capital to the extent of 15*s.* per share, as having been lost or being unrepresented by available assets.

Held, that the issue of the shares at a discount was illegal; that the shareholders were still liable to the extent of 15*s.* per share; and that the proposed reduction could not be confirmed by the court.—In re New Chile Gold Mining Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 909 — 38 Ch. D. 475.

CONTRIBUTORY—

6. Application for shares—Condition.—M., in answer to an advertisement, applied for the appointment of district manager to a provident association, and was informed that the elected candidate must take seven fully paid £5 shares. He applied for seven shares, the application not stating any condition, and sent a cheque for £35. He afterwards received a form of official appointment, with conditions different from those previously mentioned. He declined the appointment, and stopped the cheque.

Held, that M's. application for shares was conditional, and that he was not liable as a contributory in the winding up of the association.—In re London and Provincial Provident Association, Megridge's case, CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. T. 801.

8. Director—Qualification.—A person by becoming a director of a company and acting as such does not, ipso facto, agree with the company to take the requisite qualification shares.

A. was duly elected as a director of a company, and for some time acted in that capacity, but he never applied for or agreed to take the qualification shares prescribed by the articles of association of the company.

Held, that A. was not liable to be placed on the list of contributories on the winding up of the company.—In re Wheal Buller Consols Co., Ex parte Jobling, C.A. 723—38 Ch. D. 42; 57 L. J. Ch. 833; 58 L. T. 823.

9. Infant—Acquiescence—Companies Act, 1862, s. 35.—In 1882 600 shares in a company were registered in the name of A., an infant, by his employer with his knowledge, but A. never received a letter of allotment. In 1883 A. executed a transfer of the shares, which the company refused to register. A. afterwards repudiated the shares. After A. came of age, the company was wound up.

Held, that A. was liable as a contributory.—In re Yeoland Consols Co., CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. T. 922.

10. Paid-up shares—Contract—Registration—Assignment of shares—Burden of proof—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.—In 1881 a company was formed with the object, according to the prospectus, of purchasing the business of H. & Co., the purchase-money to include certain fully paid-up shares. N., who was H.'s solicitor, prepared the memorandum and articles of association. Shares were allotted, and certificates were issued to H., stating that the full amount of the shares had been paid, but the contract was not registered. In 1882 H. gave to the trustees of the marriage settlement of B. a bond to secure a debt. The bond formed part of the settled property, and H. deposited, as collateral security, some of the paid-up shares. N. was one of the trustees of the settlement, and he prepared the bond and memorandum of deposit. In 1885 the deposited shares were transferred to the trustees, fresh certificates being issued. The company was wound up. N. alleged that he did not know that the deposited shares were vendor's shares, and other trustees relied on N.'s statement that the shares were paid up.

Held, that the burden of proving that the trustees had notice that the shares were not fully paid up was on the liquidator; and that the trustees were not liable for calls on the shares.

11. Paid-up shares—Contract—Registration—Specific performance—Companies Act, 1867, s. 25.—Subject to confirmation by a meeting of shareholders, the directors of a company agreed with A. that he should accept fully paid-up shares in satisfaction of an admitted claim for services rendered. At a subsequent shareholders' meeting it was agreed that a sum of money should be voted to A., and that he should take it in fully paid-up shares. The agreement was not registered, and there was no satisfactory evidence of any allotment or acceptance of shares thereunder. The company was wound up, and the liquidator applied to place A. on the list of contributories as a holder of unpaid shares.

Held that, as between A. and the company, the duty of registering the agreement was not thrown upon A., but on the party seeking to enforce it; that a contract to take unpaid shares could not be enforced; and that A. was not liable as a contributory.—In re Barangah Oil Refining Co., Arnot's case, C.A.—30 Ch. D. 702; 57 L. J. Ch. 195; 57 L. T. 358.

12. Paid-up shares—Contract—Registration—Transfer with notice—Estoppel—Companies Act, 1867, s. 25.—A company incorporated as a company limited by shares contracted with a French association to issue and allot to the French association, or its nominee, shares in the company, such shares to be credited as fully paid up, in consideration of services to be rendered by the French association to the company; and the contract contained a clause that the company should procure registration of the contract before issuing the shares. Two hundred shares were, in pursuance of this contract, issued and allotted to S., the nominee of the French association, as fully paid-up shares, but no money was paid for them by S., nor was any sum of money at the time due by the company to S. and set off against the amount of the shares. S. transferred the shares to H., a director of the company, and H. transferred 100 of them to B., another director. Certificates were issued stating these shares to be fully paid up. The contract with the French association was never registered. The company went into liquidation, and the liquidator put H. and B. on the list of contributories as liable for the full amount of these 100 shares respectively held by them. H. and B. applied to have the certificate of contributories varied by having their names expunged therefrom. The evidence showed that S. and H. and B., when they respectively took the shares in question were aware of the fact that nothing had been paid on them, but that both H. and B. believed that the contract with the French association had been registered. There was no evidence to show that either H. or B. had given any value for the respective transfers of the shares to them.

Held, on the facts of the case as appearing from the evidence, that neither the company nor the liquidator were estopped from saying either that no payment had been made in respect of the shares, or that the contract had not been registered, and that H. and B. were liable for the full amount of the shares.

No part of the debt so assigned to K. was payable by the company till the 30th of June, 1886, nor had any call been made on the 2nd of April in respect of K.'s shares. Beyond the minutes of the above resolutions, the books of the company contained no entry as to the above transaction, and no contract as to the mode of payment for the shares was registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. On the 26th of April, 1886, a winding-up order was made, on a creditor's petition, presented on the 5th of April.

Held (affirming the decision of Kay, J., 36 W. R. 570, 37 Ch. D. 566), that the transaction was not equivalent to, and could not support a plea of, payment in cash within the principle laid down in Sharpe's case, 21 W. R. 396, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 407, and White's case, 27 W. R. 895, 12 Ch. D. 511; and that K. was liable for calls made in the winding up in respect of the shares.

Held, also, on the evidence, that, on the 2nd of April, 1886, the company was, to the knowledge of the directors, in an insolvent state, and that the transaction of that date was invalid, as a fraudulent preference, within section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862.—In re Land Development Association, Kent's case, C.A. 515.

shares fully paid up. It was doubtful whether there was a contract to issue the shares as fully paid-up shares or only a contract to issue the shares at a discount, but no contract was registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The shares issued were not in fact fully paid up. The company went into liquidation, and a holder of some of the shares in question was placed on the list of contributories, and paid the liquidator the amount remaining unpaid thereon. The holder claimed to prove against the company in the winding up in damages, to the amount of the call paid by him, "for breach of contract or otherwise in relation to the issue of the shares."

Held, that, even assuming that there was a contract to issue the shares as fully paid up, the holder of the shares was precluded, by the principle of the decision in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, from putting in any proof in the winding up in respect of damages for breach of contract.

Decision of Kay, J. (36 W. R. 57), affirmed.

Semble, that, even if the holder of the shares had been entitled to prove, he could not, having regard to section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, have proved in competition with outside creditors of the company.—In re Addlestone Linoleum Co., Benson's case, C.A. 227—37 Ch. 16. Priority—Shipping—Freight—Hypothecation—Winding up.—The directors of a shipping company, by resolution, authorised the company's brokers to hypothecate the freight of two ships, to secure an advance of not less than £5,000. The brokers afterwards transferred the freight of one ship to A. to secure an advance of £3,000, the brokers undertaking to collect the freight as A.'s agents. The company was wound up.

Held, that the hypothecation to A. had priority over the claims of the holders of debentures in the company.—Ward v. Royal Exchange Shipping Co., CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 174.

18. Registration—Mortgage to director—Companies Act, 1862, s. 43.—Debentures in a company incorporated under the Companies Act were issued to a director. The debentures were not registered within the meaning of section 43 of the Companies Act, 1862. Upon the company going into liquidation the validity of the debentures was contested both by unsecured creditors and by other debenture-holders.

Held, that the omission to register did not invalidate the debentures.

DIRECTOR—

19. Contract with company—Ratification—Vote at meeting.—A director, holding a majority of shares in a company, entered into a voidable contract with a company, being himself the vendor.

Held, that the fact of being a director did not incapacitate the vendor from voting as a shareholder in a general meeting to ratify the contract.—North-West Transportation Co. v. Beatty, P.C. 647—12 App. 589; 56 L. J. P. C. 102; 57 L. T. 426.

20. Misfeasance—Sale to company—Non-disclosure of interest—Companies Act, 1862, s. 165.—The directors of a company were empowered to purchase, and did purchase, certain properties. One of the directors had, previously to his becoming a director, acquired an interest in the properties. The company went into liquidation, and a shareholder, whose shares were fully paid up, took out a summons under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, as a contributory, asking for a declaration that the director had been guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust in not disclosing his interest, and that the properties had been purchased at a price above their proper value, and asking also that he might be ordered to refund the loss which had accrued.

Held, that the evidence was not sufficient to prove either that the director had not disclosed his interest or that the price was excessive.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 33 W. R. 788, 29 Ch. D. 795) affirmed on the ground of insufficient evidence.

Semble, that a person who is merely a contributory in respect of shares fully paid up has no locus standi to apply under section 165 unless he can show that he might derive some benefit thereby.—Cavendish-Bentinck v. Fenn, C.A. 641—12 App. 652; 57 L. J. Ch. 552; 57 L. T. 773.

21. Removal — Resolution — Meeting — Irregular notice.—Mere irregularity in summoning directors to a board meeting—such as the mere non-issue of a notice to a particular director, or not giving him sufficient notice—though it may entitle that director to object and require another board meeting to be held, is not such an irregularity as to render the meeting, when held—of persons who are in fact directors and intend to act as a board—incompetent to authorise the calling of a special general meeting of shareholders, and cannot deprive the general meeting called in consequence—when, in all other respects, regularly summoned—from exercising the powers which are given it by the articles.

Harben v. Phillips, 31 W. R. 173, 23 Ch. D. 14, explained.

Before the incorporation of a company an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and a trustee for the intended company, stipulating (inter alia) that the plaintiff should be a director and should not be removable till after 1888. This agreement was set out and adopted in the articles of association, but there was no other evidence of any contract being entered into between the plaintiff and the company adopting the agreement. After the formation of the company the plaintiff was appointed a director, and shares were allotted to him. In October, 1887, at a special general meeting, a resolution was passed that the plaintiff should be removed from the directorate. The plaintiff brought an action to restrain the company and the other directors from acting on or confirming the resolution.

Held, that the agreement as to the non-removal of the plaintiff from the directorate was not an agreement entered into with the company, and that, though the agreement was embodied in the articles, it did not thereby—in the absence of any other evidence to show that the company had entered into the agreement—become a contract between the plaintiff and the company, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction.

22. Ultrà vires—Dividend—Payment out of capital—Repayment.—The directors of a company lent money on mortgage, on the terms that the money lent, together with an addition representing interest, should be repaid by equal monthly instalments extending over a period of years. The directors delegated the preparation of the balance-sheets to the manager. The articles prohibited the payment of dividends out of capital, and enjoined their payment out of profits arrived at upon estimates of account. The manager, in preparing the balance-sheets, omitted to prepare, as prescribed by the articles, a statement of the income and expenditure of the company. He fixed the amount of dividend to be paid, and justified its payment on the accounts in which it was provided for by estimating future instalments as presently repayable, without proper discount. The valuation of certain freehold property, part of which was used as the company's offices, was increased. The auditor of the company, who stated that he did not look at the articles, although he knew of their existence, approved the accounts and dividends. The directors relied upon the manager and auditor, and declared dividends in accordance with the accounts. Large sums were expended in dividend under the above state of things which were attributable to capital.

Held, that the manager, auditor, and directors were liable for the sums so expended in dividend from time to time while they respectively held their offices.

On the 23rd of July A. wrote a letter to B. authorising him to sell the shares at a specified price. On the 27th of August B. sold the shares to D. at a higher price than A. had named. B. sent the transfer with D.'s name inserted to the company, but registration of the transfer was refused, at A.'s request.

Held, that B. was an equitable mortgagee with a power of sale; and that the register of shareholders must be rectified by inserting D.'s name as holder of the shares.—In re Kimberley Diamond Mines Co., Ex parte Wernher, CH.D. NOR., J.—58 L. T. 305.

ULTRA VIRES—

27. Debenture—Mortgage—Uncalled capital—Contract—Ratification.—The directors of a company, in accordance with the provisions of its memorandum and articles of association, adopted an agreement entered into before its formation by a trustee for the company for the purchase of certain leasehold premises and other property, the vendor of which was one of the directors, the price having been previously varied with his consent by substituting debentures for cash payment. The leasehold premises were accordingly assigned to the company, who sealed the deed of assignment and took possession of the premises, and carried on their business there; and the debentures were issued to the vendor and his nominees. The company was afterwards wound up, and the liquidator obtained from the vendor an assignment of the other property comprised in the agreement.

Held, that there existed a contract between the company and the vendor to the effect of the previous agreement, with the variation as to payment, and that the debentures were issued for the purpose of such payment, and were valid.

The fire assurance company was wound up.

Held, (1) that guarantee business was insurance business contemplated by the deed of settlement, and within the powers of the society; (2) that the agreements did not constitute an amalgamation between the companies nor a partnership, but were agreements of agency, and that, the company having had the benefit of the agreements, the burden of proof was upon it to show that they were invalid.—In re Norwich Equitable Fire Assurance Society, Ex parte Royal Insurance Co., CH.D. The articles of association provided that the directors might from time to time, at their discretion, borrow from the directors, members, or other persons any sums for the purposes of the company, but such sums were not to exceed, without the sanction of a general meeting, one-fifth of the nominal capital, nor, with such sanction, one-third of the general capital. The directors issued debentures to the amount of £3,050, of which A. held £1,650, the nominal capital being £10,000. The articles empowered the company to purchase its own shares. On the company being wound up, a shareholder claimed the balance of the price of shares sold by him to the company before the winding up and not wholly paid for.

Held, that the company was not entitled by its memorandum of association to purchase its own shares; and that the purchase was ultrâ vires, and the claim must fail.

In re Plaskynaston Tube Co., 23 Ch. D. 542, 32 W. R. Dig. 41, and In re Ince Hall Rolling Mills Co., 23 Ch. D. 545n, overruled.

The memorandum of association of a company incorporated under the Companies Acts as a company limited by shares stated its capital to be £210,000, divided into 210,000 shares of £1 each, and that, on any increase of capital by special resolution, the company might attach to shares any preferential rights as to dividend or capital or any other special incidents or restrictions. By a special resolution duly passed and confirmed, it was declared that the capital of the company should be increased to 420,000 shares by the issue of 210,000 shares of £1 each, credited with 18s. per share paid. By a contract in writing made between the company and certain applicants for shares whose names were subscribed to the contract, it was agreed that the company should allot and issue to each subscriber the number of shares specified opposite their respective names, and that the shares should be issued and held as shares of £1 each, with 18s. per share credited as paid up thereon, making, with a deposit of 1s. per share, the sum of 19s. paid up on each share. This contract was duly registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, and each subscriber received notice of the issue and of the allotment, but no certificate of these shares had been given. One of the allottees, while the company was still a going concern and solvent, applied, under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, to have his name taken off the register.

Held, that the issue of the shares on such a footing, and notwithstanding the registered contract, was ultrà vires, and that the application should be granted.

Judgment of Chitty, J., reversed.—In re Almada and Tirito Co., Allen's case, C.A. 593—57 L. J. Ch. 706; 38 Ch. D. 415.

WINDING UP—

33. Balance order—Action against contributory—Companies Act, 1862, s. 75.—By a balance order made in the winding up of a company a contributory was ordered to pay a certain sum to the liquidator of the company. The sum was not paid, and the liquidator commenced an action in the name of the company against the contributory to enforce the balance order.

Held, that an action could not be brought to enforce a balance order.—Chalk, Webb, & Co. v. Tennent, CH.D. NOR., J. 263—57 L. T. 598.

34. Compulsory order — Costs — Companies Act, 1862, s. 149.—A creditor's petition was presented for the compulsory winding up of a company. After the presentation of the petition the company went into voluntary liquidation. At the hearing of the petition the petitioner asked for a supervision order, while a majority of the creditors of the company pressed for a compulsory order.

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction under section 149 of the Companies Act, 1862, to force a compulsory order on the petitioner at the instance of a majority of the creditors.

A supervision order was made, and the creditors asking for a compulsory order were treated as supporting the petition, and were allowed to share in the costs.—In re Chepstow Bobbin Mills Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 180—36 Ch. D. 563; 57 L. J. Ch. 168; 57 L. T. 752.

35. Compulsory order—Discretion of court—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 86, 145, 151.—A petition by a creditor of a company for a compulsory winding up stood over for the petitioner to bring an action for his debt, which was disputed. The company afterwards passed a petition for a voluntary winding up, a liquidator was appointed, and the petitioner's debt was admitted.

Held, that the court was not bound to make a compulsory order.—In re New York Exchange Co., CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 915.

36. Contract after winding up—Benefit of company—Evidence—Burden of proof—Companies Act, 1862, s. 131.—In an action by a company in voluntary liquidation upon a contract made after the commencement of the winding up, and which, but for the winding up, would have been in the ordinary course of its business, the onus of proving that the contract was not for the beneficial winding up of the company within section 131 of the Companies Act, 1862, lies upon the defendant.—Hire-Purchase Furnishing Co. v. Richens, C.A. 365—20 Q. B. D. 387; 58 L. T. 460.

37. Discovery—Inspection—Companies Act, 1862, s. 156.—The power of ordering inspection under section 156 of the Companies Act, 1862, of the books and property of a company which is being wound up ought to be exercised only for the purposes of the winding up and for the benefit of those interested in the winding up, and will not, as a rule, be exercised in order to enable a shareholder to establish a claim against the directors or promoter.

Section 156 of the Companies Act, 1862, gives the court no jurisdiction over third persons who have in their possession books or papers of a company and who claim to be entitled to such possession.—In re North Brasilian Sugar Factories Co., C.A.—37 Ch. D. 83; 57 L. J. Ch. 110; 58 L. T. 4.

38. Payment after winding-up order—Pre-existing debt—Discretion of court—Companies Act, 1862, s. 153.—Payment by a company, after the commencement of the winding up, of a bonâ fide debt previously due is not a transaction to which the court will, in the exercise of its discretion, give validity.—In re Civil Service and General Stores Co., CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 119.

39. Petition—District Registry—Transfer to High Court—Ord. 35, r. 16.—The court will not order the removal of a proceeding from a district registry to the High Court, unless the balance of convenience is in favour of the transfer, or business has been taken to the district registry which ought not to be there.—In re Neath and Bristol Steamship Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—58 L. T. 180.

40. Priority—Crown debt—Postmaster-General.—With the sanction of the Postmaster-General, certain Post Office officials made arrangements with a bank to place to their private account money received on account of the Post Office, as well as money of their own, drawing cheques both on their own account and for payment to the Post Office. The bank was wound up.

Held, that the Postmaster-General had priority over all other creditors in respect of money due to the Post Office.—In re West London Commercial Bank, CH.D. CHI., J.—38 Ch. D. 364.

41. Rent—Mortgage—Attornment clause—Distress—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 87, 163.—The L. Co. mortgaged certain cotton mills and the machinery therein to W. The deed contained a clause by which the L. Co. attorned tenants to W. at an annual rent

A winding-up order was subsequently made against the company, and the official liquidator remained in possession of the mills with a view to selling them as a going concern. He expended money in keeping up the mills and machinery, but he did not actually work them. The mortgagees, who were the executors of C., to whom W. had transferred the mortgage, acquiesced in this arrangement, believing it to be for the benefit of all parties interested. The mortgagees applied to the court for leave to distrain for one year's rent due under the attornment clause which had accrued since the winding-up order.

Held, that leave must be refused, as no special equity in favour of the mortgagees had been proved, and that, on the evidence, it was shown that the premises remained in the occupation of the liquidator for the joint benefit of the company and the mortgagees.

A mortgagee with an attornment clause does not stand in so favourable a position as an ordinary landlord.

42. Repayment to shareholders—Surplus assets—Paid-up shares—Interest.—Certain shares in a company were allotted as fully paid up, and the articles of association provided that the holders of such shares should be entitled to interest upon such amount of the nominal value of these shares as should be equal to the amount for the time being not called up on the ordinary shares. The amount due on the latter shares was not called up in full. The company went into liquidation, and, after paying its debts and liabilities and repaying to the above-mentioned shareholders the excess in value of their shares over the ordinary shares, there remained a surplus distributable among the shareholders.

Held, that the holders of the fully paid-up shares were entitled to interest on the amount repaid to them, to be calculated from the date of the commencement of the winding up to the date of the repayment.—In re Exchange Drapery Co., CH.D. KAY, J. 444—38 Ch. D. 171; 58 L. T. 544.

43. Stay of proceedings—Scotch action—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 85, 87.—A Scotch company having its registered office at Edinburgh sued an Australian company having its registered office at Brisbane for money sent out for investment, and lost by fraudulent or improper investment. An order was made in Queensland to wind up the defendant company, and afterwards a winding-up order was made in England, and was directed to be ancillary to the order of the colonial court.

Held, that the proceedings in the Scotch action ought to be stayed.—In re Queensland Mercantile Agency Co., CH.D. NOR., J.—58 L. T. 876.

44. Vesting order—Ex parte order—Companies Act, 1867, s. 203.—A vesting order under section 203 of the Companies Act, 1867, cannot, except under special circumstances, be obtained ex parte.—In re Albion Mutual Permanent Building Society, CH.D. CHL., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 248.

1. Accord and satisfaction—Cheque—Costs—Interest.—An action was dismissed, with costs. The defendant's solicitor had the costs taxed, and took the taxing master's certificate to the plaintiff's solicitor, who gave him a cheque for the amount, and received from him the certificate with a receipt endorsed on it. After payment of the cheque, the defendant's solicitor discovered that the defendant was entitled to interest on the costs from the date of the judgment, but the plaintiff refused to pay such interest

Held (affirming the decision of Stirling, J.), that the defendant, by his solicitor, had accepted the cheque in accord and satisfaction, and that the plaintiff could not be directed to produce the certificate in order that execution might be issued for the interest.—Bidder v. Bridges, C.A.—37 Ch. D. 406; 57 L. J. Ch. 300; 58 L. T. 656.

2. Arbitration—Fees of arbitrator and umpire.—Where parties in a mercantile dispute agree to refer the matters in difference to arbitration, an implied contract is thereby created to pay the arbitrator and umpire who acted in the reference reasonable remuneration for their services.

3. Condition—Schoolmaster.—The defendant's son was a pupil at the plaintiff's school, and the defendant had notice of a rule that no pupil was allowed to be absent for a night during Easter Term. The plaintiff allowed the defendant's son to go to the defendant's house during Easter Term, on condition of his returning the same evening. The defendant sent the plaintiff a telegram, stating that it was not convenient for his son to return before the next morning, and the plaintiff telegraphed, in reply, that, if the defendant's son did not return that night he would not receive him back at all. The defendant did not send his son back.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to fees for the whole of Easter Term, and that the defendant could not recover damages for breach of contract.—Price v. Wilkins, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 680.

4. Consideration—Failure—Company—Sale of shares—Registration.—The defendant sold shares in a company through a broker on the London Stock Exchange. The plaintiff purchased the shares through a broker. The transfer was executed, and the price of the shares was paid upon the delivery of the transfer in accordance with the rules and usages of the Stock Exchange; and this was done before any application could be made by the transferee to the company to register him in respect of the shares. The plaintiff applied to the company to have his name entered upon the register as the transferee of the shares, but the company declined to register him. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant to recover back the price paid for the shares, on upon a total failure of consideration.

Held (affirming the judgment of Stephen, J.), that the defendant was not liable, as the contract of sale did not impose upon him the obligation of procuring the registration of the transferee by the company.

5. Death of promisor—Promise of marriage—Action against executor—Special damage.—An action for breach of promise of marriage, where no special damage is alleged, does not survive against the personal representatives of the deceased promisor.

Special damage must consist in some loss to the property of the promisee flowing directly from the breach, or within the contemplation of both parties at the date of the promise as the probable result of the breach, according to the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale, 2 W. R. 302, 9 Ex. 341; and such special damage alone can be recovered.

6. Foreign Government—De facto Government—Ratification.—The defendants, who were French subjects, contracted with the Peruvian Government for the purchase of guano, and agreed to be bound by the tribunals of Peru. Disputes arose on matters of account, and the matter was compromised between the defendants, who assented to this course, and the de facto Government of the Dictator, which had been recognised by the French Government. After many years' litigation against other parties in other English courts, the defendants recovered a large sum to which they were entitled under the compromise, and this sum was still in court. The plaintiffs, who were the de jure Government of Peru, reconstituted in 1886, did not interfere in the proceedings, but moved to restrain the defendants from taking the money out of court, on the ground that the compromise was void unless ratified by the de jure Government when restored.

Held, that the question was one of international law; that the acts of the de facto Government towards foreigners by whose Government it had been recognised did not require ratification and could not be repudiated by the de jure Government; that the compromise was valid; and that, taking into consideration the balance of convenience and the attitude of the Peruvian Government during the litigation, and the fact that the Dictator's Government could not have recovered the money, the motion must be dismissed, with costs.—Republic of Peru v. Dreyfus, CH.D. KAY, J. 492—38 Ch. D. 348; 57 L. J. Ch. 536; 58 L. T. 433.

7. Rescission—Notice—Reasonable time—Specific performance.—A., who was trustee of the bare legal estate in a farm, contracted, on the 8th of July, to sell it to B. As soon as B. discovered, by the answers to his requisitions, the true state of the title, he, by further requisitions, about the middle of August, required that the beneficiaries should sign or ratify the contract. A. at first refused, and proposed that they should merely join in the conveyance; but upon B. insisting on his requisition A. promised, "without prejudice," that it should be done. The original contract was to have been completed on the 4th of August, but time was not made of the essence. On the 11th of October B. wrote that, unless he received the ratification "within the present week," he should "seek to rescind." Four weeks later, not having received it, he wrote, "The contract is now rescinded." A. had obtained all the necessary signatures within a day or two afterwards.

Held, that B. might have rescinded immediately his requisition as to the beneficiaries signing the contract was rejected, and that, at any time after that—the rule as to fixing a reasonable time not being applicable, A. not being able to make a good title himself, nor having power to compel a conveyance by those who could—B. might have declined to wait any longer; and that, even if the rule had been applicable, the time allowed was, under the circumstances, reasonable.

8. Set-off—Counter-claim—Unliquidated damages.—A company contracted to complete a railway in five years, and to maintain and work it, in consideration of which the Government of Newfoundland covenanted to pay to the company an annual subsidy for thirty-five years, to attach proportionately and form part of the company's assets on the completion and working of each section of five miles, and to grant to the company in fee simple 5,000 acres of land for each completed mile of railway on completion of each section. The company made part of the line, and, on completion of each section, received proportionate grants of land and half-yearly payments on account of the subsidy. The company afterwards committed a breach of the contract.

Held, (1) that each claim to a grant of land was complete on the completion of each section; (2) that, on the completion of each section, a proportionate subsidy became payable, subject to the condition of continuous working; (3) that the Government could counter-claim for damages for non-completion of the railway against the company's assignees.—Newfoundland Government v. Newfoundland Railway Co., P.C. —13 App. 199; 57 L. J. P. C. 35; 58 L. T. 285.

9. Specific performance—Written contract—Parol evidence.—By the terms of a written agreement, J. agreed to lease to W. "a shop and premises . . . which are to be built at a cost not to exceed £400, . . . at the annual rental of £75. . . ." J. expended £750 in building the premises, and refused to grant a lease to W. at the annual rent of £75. In an action by W. for specific performance of the written agreement, J. set up as a defence a contemporaneous parol proviso to the agreement, to the effect that, if the outlay exceeded £400, the rent was to be raised in proportion.

Held, that, as the parol proviso did not contradict, but merely explained, the terms of the written instrument, evidence of it was admissible; and that, as the evidence proved that the plaintiff had agreed to such parol proviso, the action must be dismissed.

Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 30—Copyhold Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 73), s. 45.—A sole surviving trustee of copyholds, who was tenant on the court rolls, died in 1884. His executors had not been admitted tenants to the property before the passing of the Copyhold Act, 1887.

Held, that, on the passing of the Copyhold Act, 1887, the Conveyancing Act, 1881, ceased to have any application to copyholds, and that the copyholds were vested in and could be dealt with by the persons in whom they would have been vested if the Act of 1881 had never been passed.

2. Lecture—Publication—University professor.—A professor in Glasgow University delivered lectures to a class of students, who paid fees for the right to attend.

Held (Lord Fitzgerald dissenting), that the professor did not thereby publish the lectures to the whole world, so as to entitle anyone who heard them to republish them without the permission of the authr.—Caird v. Sime, H.L. 199—12 App. 326; 57 L. T. 634.

The plaintiff had for some years acted as musical conductor at defendant's music-hall, and had composed pieces for performance which had been performed there, and for which he had been paid.

Held, that the relations existing between the parties were no bar to an action by the plaintiff for infringement of copyright.—Eaton v. Lake, Q.A. 277—20 Q. B. D. 378; 57 L. J. Q. B. 227.

Some of the copies were sent to the defendant's agents in England before, and sold by them after, registration of the copyright.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction and damages for breach of contract, and (dissentiente Lopes, L.J.) to an injunction, damages, and an order for delivery of pirated copies; but that they were not entitled to penalties.

CORONER:—

1. Inquisition—Irregularity—Amendment—Certiorari—Coroners Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 71), s. 20.—A coroner's inquisition stated that the jury "say upon their oaths that the directors of the Great Western Railway Co. did feloniously kill and slay" the deceased.

Held, that the jurisdiction of the High Court to quash irregular inquisitions has not been affected by section 20 of the Coroners Act, 1887, which gives power to "the court having cognisance of the case" to amend defects in inquisitions; and that, on an application for a writ of certiorari, the inquisition could not be amended, but must be quashed.—Reg. v. Great Western Railway Co., Q.B.D. 506—20 Q. 2. Misconduct — Inquisition—Verdict—Depositions—Certiorari.—On an application for a certiorari to quash a coroner's inquisition, the court will not examine the depositions returned by the coroner in order to ascertain whether there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

A. was killed, and B. and C. were wounded, by police-constables, who fired rifles during an affray. An inquest was held on A., and was adjourned after the jury had viewed A.'s body. B. died the day before the adjourned inquest, and the same jurors were, by the coroner's direction, summoned to hold an inquest on B. C. died two days afterwards, and the same jury investigated the death of all three parties. The jury had retired, and the coroner took their verdict in a private room, and not in court.

Held, that the coroner had been guilty of misconduct, and that the proceedings were irregular.—In re Mitchelstown Inquisition, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 279.

COSTS:—

1. Administration—Next of kin.—In a contest for the right to letters of administration among the next of kin primâ facie equally entitled, the administrator should be selected by the registrar on summons, and persons improperly brought into court by a motion will be entitled to their costs.—In the Goods of John, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. T. 683.

2. Administration—Payment into court.—Executors cannot, by payment into court or any other conveyance of a legacy, relieve the residue from bearing the costs of an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining who are the persons entitled to take.—In re Gibbon, C.A. CHI., J. 180—36 Ch. D. 486; 56 L. J. Ch. 811; 57 L. T. 8.

3. Administration action—Benefit of estate—Defaulting solicitor—Attachment.—The solicitor for the administrator of an intestate retained in his hands a portion of the estate and failed to account for it. The administrator obtained in 1876, in the Queen's Bench Division, a rule that the solicitor should be struck off the rolls, or answer an affidavit relating to the retention of the money. A writ of attachment was issued against the solicitor, who absconded. The writ was renewed in each term down to 1887. In that year, upon further consideration of an action to administer the estate, the taxing master was directed to tax the costs, charges, and expenses of the administrator properly incurred. He disallowed the costs of the proceedings against the solicitor, on the ground that they were not the ordinary proceedings, but were in the nature of punishment to the solicitor.

Held, that the object of the proceedings against the solicitor was to obtain the money due to the estate; that some of the costs ought to be allowed; and that it must be referred to the taxing master to consider what part of the disallowed costs had been incurred for the benefit of the estate.—Muckalt v. Davis, CH.D. NOR., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 3; 57 L. T. 755.

4. Administration action—Delay—Ord. 65, r. 11.—An action for administration of the estate of a testatrix was instituted in 1876. In August, 1882, Bacon, V.C., made an order in the action on further consideration declaring that the costs of the action were chargeable on the real estate of the testatrix in exoneration of her personalty, and directing taxation of the costs of all parties to the action as between solicitor and client. In May, 1883, Bacon, V.C., made a further order to the same effect with reference to the costs of all parties incurred since August, 1882, but neither of the orders expressly directed payment of the costs when so taxed. In November, 1887, the action came on, on second further consideration, before Kay, J., who directed, under order 65, a reference to the taxing officer for inquiry and report as to the cause of the delay in the proceedings, and as to who was responsible therefor.

Held, on appeal, (1) That, whether on principle or on the authorities, the orders made by Bacon, V.C., did not amount to an allowance of the costs so as to prevent the judge before whom the matter afterwards came exercising any power given him by ord. 65, r. 11; (2) that the power given by ord. 65, r. 11, was not confined to the case where costs had been incurred on behalf of, and were payable by, a party to the action, but applied also to a case where costs were payable out of a fund; (3) that the power given by the rule was not limited in its operation to costs incurred on or after the date when the new rules came into operation, but was applicable to all costs, at whatever time incurred, in any actions then pending; and that Kay, J., had jurisdiction to direct a reference with respect to costs incurred prior to October, 1883.—Brown v. Burdett, C.A. 225—37 Ch. D. 207; 58 L. T. 571.

5. Administration action—No personal estate—Costs out of real estate.—If in a creditor's action to administer real and personal estate the accounts show that there is no personal estate, the costs of the plaintiff and of the administration are payable out of the real estate.—Barry v. Quinlan, V.C. (IR.)—21 L. R. Ir. 11.

6. Administration action—Vexatious proceedings—Delay—Ord. 65, rr. 1, 11.—An administration action was brought by a person whose only interest in the estate consisted of a share of the residue, which he had bought for £55. The writ was issued in 1862, judgment was given for administration and accounts and inquiries were ordered in 1863, and the certificate was made in 1887, when it appeared that the action had been unnecessary and of no benefit to the estate.

Held, that the plaintiff must pay all the costs of the action incurred since ord. 65, r. 1, came into operation, and that the costs up to that time must be taxed, having regard to the delay which had occurred, with liberty for all parties to apply in respect of such costs.—Goldring v. Lancaster, CH.D KAY, J. 216—58 L. T. 74.

7. Appeal—Separate defendants—Discretion of taxing master—Ord. 65, r. 27.—The House of Lords, on dismissing an appeal, directed that the plaintiffs should pay the defendants' costs in all three courts, and that in taxing the costs in the High Court and in the Court of Appeal the taxing master should consider whether any of the defendants who had appeared separately had any sufficient reason for severing in their defences, and if, and in so far as, it should appear that they had not, the taxing master was to allow only one set of costs, as he should think right. The taxing master allowed each of the defendants separate costs.

Held, that the House of Lords had delegated to the taxing master the duty of deciding whether the defendants were entitled to separate costs, and that, as it had not been shown either that he had not exercised his discretion, or that he had done so on a wrong principle, an appeal from his decision could not be entertained.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.—Boswell v. Coaks (2), C.A. 209—58 L. T. 97.

8. Appeal for costs—Executor—Administration action—Ord. 65, r. 1.—An appeal lies against the decision of a judge in chambers ordering an executor who is the defendant in an administration action to pay the costs of such action on the ground of his refusal to furnish accounts.—Lewis v. Pritchard, C.A.—57 L. T. 858.

9. Attachment—Garnishee order—Company—Transfer of shares—Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 113), ss. 132, 133.—Costs will be allowed of an application under sections 132 and 133 of the Common Law Procedure Act (Ireland), 1853, to attach and transfer shares in a company, and will be payable out of the proceeds of shares in the hands of the sheriff.—Viscount Massereene v. Brannigun, Q.B.D. (IR.)—22 L. R. Ir. 65.

10. Company—Winding up—Petition—Separate creditors.—A creditor's winding-up petition stood over, and it was, at the request of the petitioner, dismissed with costs, the company having paid the petitioner's debt and costs. One of two creditors who appeared to support the winding up had, since the petition stood over, been paid part of his debt, but the other had not received anything.

Held, that the proper order was to give one set of costs to the creditor who had gained nothing by the proceedings.—In re Peckham and East Dulwich Tramways Co., CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 462; 58 L. T. 876.

11. County court—Counter-claim—Third party—County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), s. 5—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24, sub-section 3—Ord. 21, rr. 11—14—Ord 65, r. 1.—In an action by a landlord for three years' rent the defendant counter-claimed against the plaintiff and third parties for an illegal distress. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim and counter-claim, but for the defendant against the third parties for £2 5s., and such costs as the defendant would have been entitled to at law.

Held, that the costs were in the judge's discretion, and that, there having been no exercise of his discretion against the third parties, the defendant was not entitled to any costs.—Lewin v. Trimming, Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 230.

12. Discretion of judge—Special cause—Seduction

—Judicature (Ireland) Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 57), s. 53.—In an action for the seduction of a woman thirty-five years old, all the parties being in poor circumstances, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with £10 damages.

Held, that there was not "special cause" to justify the judge in depriving the plaintiff of costs.—Wilson v. McMaine, C.A. (IR.)—19 L. R. Ir. 582.

13. Divorce—Adultery of wife—Separate estate.—When a wife, who has had a decree nisi pronounced against her on the ground of adultery, is possessed of separate property, the court will refuse the usual order for the wife's costs, and will order her to pay the costs of the suit.—Millward v. Millward and Andrews, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 569.

14. Divorce—Adultery of wife—Separate estate—Undefended suit—Notice to wife.—In a suit for dissolution of marriage by a husband, costs may be given against the wife where she has separate estate, but she must have notice of the application.—Field v. Field and Denton, P.D. & A.D. 720—13 P. D. 23; 58 L. T. 90.

15. Divorce — Co-respondent — Queen's Proctor — Costs of intervention—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 34—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 144), s. 7—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 2.—Where the petitioner proved charges of adultery against his wife, and the court pronounced a decree nisi for dissolution and condemned the co-respondent in costs, and the Queen's Proctor subsequently intervened but failed to establish his charges, the court, on a separate application, refused to condemn the co-respondent in the petitioner's costs of the Queen's Proctor's intervention.—Blackhall v. Blackhall and Clarke, P.D. & A.D. 926—13 P. D. 94; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 60.

16. Divorce — Wife's costs.—At the trial of a wife's suit for a divorce the charges of cruelty were withdrawn, and the court held that the charges of adultery had not been proved. There had been no order for the respondent to secure the petitioner's costs.

The court refused to order the respondent to pay the petitioner's costs.—Thompson v. Thompson, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 374.

17. Event—Counter-claim.—Where, in a trial by jury, there is a claim and a counter-claim, which is not a set-off, but is in the nature of a cross-action, and the plaintiff succeeds on the claim and the defendant on the counter-claim, the plaintiff should have the general costs of the claim, to be taxed as though it were an independent section, and the defendant the general costs of the counter-claim, to be taxed as though it were another independent action, and the allocatur for costs should be given for the balance due to the party in whose favour such balance is.—Shrapnel v. Laing, C.A. 297—20 Q. B. D. 334; 57 L. J. Q. B. 195; 58 L. T. 705.

18. Event—Counter-claim—Ord. 65, r. 1.—The defendant admitted the plaintiff's claim for £78, and obtained a verdict for £17 on a counter-claim. The judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for his claim, with costs to the date of the counter-claim, and for the defendant for his counter-claim, with costs thereof and subsequently, including the costs of the trial.

Held, that, no "good cause" having been shown, the judge had not jurisdiction to prevent the costs from following the "event."—Wight v. Shaw, C.A. 408—19 Q. B. D. 396.

19. Infant defendant—Appearance by solicitor—Personal liability for costs.—A writ was served on an infant, for whom a solicitor entered an appearance bonâ fide, and without knowledge of the defendant's infancy. The action was afterwards discontinued on account of the defendant's infancy.

Held, that the solicitor was not personally liable for the plaintiff's costs.—Ward v. Keefe, Q.B.D. (IR.)—22 L. R. Ir. 154.

20. Injunction — Interlocutory order — Trial.—Where upon an interlocutory motion the plaintiff obtains the relief which he seeks, he is bound to apply to the defendant to have the costs disposed of on motion, and unless he does so is precluded from having the extra costs of going to trial, but if the defendant refuses to allow the matter to be disposed of on motion, or if any question remains open to be decided, the case cannot be so dealt with.—Sonneschein v. Barnard, CH.D. STI., J.—57 L. T. 712.

21. Interest—Dismissal of action — Judgment—Certificate — Ord. 42, r. 14. — By a judgment delivered before the Rules of Court, 1883, came into operation, an action was dismissed and the plaintiff was ordered to pay the costs, but the judgment contained no direction as to the date from which interest on the costs was to run. Taxation proceedings were carried on, and the taxing master's certificate was made after the rules had come into operation.

Held, affirming the decision of North, J., that the Rules of 1883 applied to the taxation proceedings, and that interest on the costs ran, not from the date of the taxing master's certificate, but from the date of the judgment.

Held, also, that the true interpretation of the words in ord. 42, r. 14: "The forms used in Appendix H. shall be followed with such variations as circumstances may require"—is, that the forms in Appendix H. can only be varied for the purpose of making them to be in accordance with the terms of the judgment or order.—Boswell v. Coaks, C.A. 65—36 Ch. D. 441; 57 L. J. Ch. 101; 57 L. T. 742.

22. Judgment—Summons—Ord. 32, r. 6—Ord. 40, r. 1.—In an action to restrain the publication of a trade circular, the defendants, by their statement of defence, offered to submit to a perpetual injunction in the terms of an interim injunction which had been previously granted, "to be obtained on a summons to be issued for that purpose." The plaintiffs set the action down on notice of motion for judgment on the admissions in the pleadings, and delivered to the defendants a copy of the minutes of the proposed judgment, which was identical with that to which the defendants had offered to submit.

Held, that the plaintiffs ought to have proceeded by summons in chambers, and would only be allowed such costs as would have been properly incurred if they had proceeded by summons.—London Sanitary Dyeing Co. v. Digby, CH.D. NOR., J. 497—57 L. J. Ch. 505.

23. Mortgage — Foreclosure action — Mortgagee in possession—Claim for personal payment—Summons—Ord. 55, r. 5*a*.—A mortgagee in possession brought an action for foreclosure, and asked on motion for judgment for (inter alia) an order for personal payment by the mortgagor of the amount due, but this part of the order was refused.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to the costs of the action, and not simply to such costs as he would have received if he had proceeded by summons.—Brooking v. Skewis, CH.D. KAY, J. 215—58 L. T. 73.

24. Mortgage—Foreclosure action—Receiver—Summons—Ord. 55, r. 5*a*.—A mortgagee brought a foreclosure action, the facts being complicated, and the speedy appointment of a receiver being of importance

The receiver was duly appointed, and the defendant did not appear in the action.

Held, on motion for judgment, that the plaintiff was only entitled to such costs as he would have been entitled to if he had proceeded by summons.

Semble, that a receiver can be appointed on a summons under ord. 55, r. 5a.—Barr v. Harding, CH.D. KAY, J. 216.

25. Motion — Interlocutory injunction — Postponement till trial.—In a patent action a motion was made on behalf of the plaintiff for an interim injunction, but was not heard on the merits, the order made being "motion to stand to trial." No order was made as to costs. On the trial judgment was given for the defendant, with costs; but nothing was said as to the costs of the motion, and the taxing master, in drawing up the judgment, refused to include them.

Held, that, where a motion is adjourned or stands over to the trial, and no mention is made as to the costs of it either then or at the trial, the judgment carries the costs of the motion.—Gosnell v. Bishop, CH.D. KEK., J. 505—38 Ch. D. 385; 57 L. J. Ch. 642.

26. Partition—Trustees—Deceased trustees.—In a partition action an order was made directing taxation of costs, including in the costs of the trustees one moiety of any costs and expenses properly incurred by them beyond their costs of the action.

Held, that the trustees were bound to pay all costs of former deceased trustees properly incurred; and that the burden of proof that any payments were wrongly made was on the objectors.—Harvey v. Oliver, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 239.

27. Payment into court—Discontinuance—Ord. 26, r. 1; ord. 65, r. 1.—On a summons, under order 14, for the payment of a sum of money, the master ordered the defendant to pay money into court as to part of the claim, and gave leave to defend as to the remainder. After issue joined, the plaintiff discontinued the action. The master gave the defendant the whole costs of the action from the beginning.

Held, that the costs were not governed by ord. 26, r. 1, but were in the discretion of the court, under ord. 65, r. 1, and that the plaintiff was entitled to his costs up to the time of payment into court.

Langridge v. Campbell, 25 W. R. 351, 2 Ex. D. 281, distinguished.—Suckling v. Gabb, Q.B.D. 175.

28. Scale—Arbitration—Ord. 65, r. 12.—An action on a partnership account was by consent referred to an arbitrator. The terms of reference were that "all matters in difference between the parties in the action" should be referred, and that "the costs of the action" should abide the award. After the order of reference the parties agreed to submit to the arbitrator a further matter of account outside the action. The arbitrator awarded £40 to the plaintiff on his claim, and found that a further sum of £14 2s. was due to him on the subsequent account.

Held, that the plaintiff had recovered "in the action" less than £50, and therefore came under the provisions of ord. 65, r. 12, whereby the costs recoverable are limited to county court costs in actions of contract where less than £50 is recovered, unless by leave of the court the High Court scale is allowed.—Emmett v. Heyes, Q.B.D. 237.

29. Scale—County Courts Act, 1867, s. 5—Ord. 65, rr. 1, 12.—Where the plaintiff in an action founded on contract within the meaning of section 5 of the County Courts Act, 1867, recovers less than £20, the court can, under ord. 65, r. 1, allow him costs upon the county court scale.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (36 W. R. 62) reversed.—Neaves v. Spooner, C.A. 257—58 L. T. 164.

30. Security—Absence of plaintiff.—A plaintiff who is a seafaring man, but whose family reside permanently within the jurisdiction, and who resides with his family when not on a voyage, will be ordered to give security for the costs of an action.—Martin v. Russell, V.C. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 196.

31. Security—Administration action—Executor—Set-off.—In an administration action A. appealed against a finding that B. was the heir-at-law. B. died, and A. revived the proceedings against D., B.'s executor and devisee in trust. D. was insolvent, but A. had been ordered to pay to D. the costs of a previous appeal.

Held, that A. must give security for costs.—Knight v. Gardner, C.A.—38 Ch. D. 168; 58 L. T. 699.

32. Security — Appeal — Special circumstances — Abuse of process of court—Ord. 58, r. 15.—An appellant may be ordered to give security for the costs of an appeal where a primâ facie case of abuse of the process of the court has been made out.—Weldon v. Maples, C.A. 154—20 Q. B. D. 331; 57 L. J. Q. B. 224; 57 L. T. 672.

33. Security—Company—Winding up—Petitioner abroad — Judgment against company.—A company against which a winding-up petition had been presented applied that the petitioner, who was resident abroad, might be ordered to give security for costs. The petitioner had obtained judgment in an undefended action against the company.

Held, that no security need be given.—In re Contract and Agency Corporation, CH.D. STL., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 3.

34. Security—Married woman—Next friend.—A married woman suing by her next friend may be ordered to find security for costs.—Stevens v. Thompson, C.A.—38 Ch. D. 317; 57 L. J. Ch. 748.

35. Shipping—Collision—Action—Towing—Co-defendants.—The barge E., while being towed by the S., was damaged by a collision with the steamship R. The owners of the E. commenced an action, joining the owners of both vessels as defendants. At the trial the R. alone was found to be to blame.

Held, that the owners of the R. must pay the costs of the owners of the S., as well as those of the plaintiffs.—The River Lagan, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. J. P. D. & A. 28.

36. Slander—Payment into court—Acceptance—Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1853, s. 126—Judicature (Ireland) Act, 1877, s. 53.—The defendant in an action for slander paid into court sixpence, which was accepted by the plaintiff in full satisfaction.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to his costs necessarily and properly incurred in the action.—McSheffrey v. Lanagan, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 528.

37. Solicitor—Contempt of court—Probate proceedings—Subpœna to bring in script.—A subpœna was issued in a non-contentious matter directing R., a solicitor, to bring into the registry a script which was stated to be, but which was not, in his possession or control.

Held, that non-compliance with the subpœna was not a contempt; that the fact that R. had not followed the practice of filing an affidavit explaining the reason for his non-compliance was not a contempt; and that the court had no jurisdiction to order him to pay the costs of an application for an order to attend for examination before the judge. — Rawlings v. Emmerson, C.A.—57 L. J. P. D. & A. 1.

38. Solicitor—Privilege—County Courts Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 101), s. 18—County Courts Act, 1867, ss. 5, 34.—Where a solicitor, as plaintiff in an action upon a bill of costs commenced in the High Court, recovers less than £20, he becomes subject to the provisions of section 5 of the County Courts Act, 1867, as to costs, and any privilege which he may have had of bringing the action in the High Court is taken away by section 18 of the County Courts Act, 1849, which is incorporated into the County Courts Act, 1867, by section 34.—Blair v. Eisler, Q.B.D. 767—21 Q. B. D. 185; 57 L. J. Q. B. 512.

39. Taxation—Arbitration—Submission—Costs of reference.—If on a reference to arbitration by consent, but not in a cause, the costs of the reference were left in the arbitrator's discretion, the costs of negotiating and settling the terms of submission may be allowed on taxation as costs of the reference.—In re Autothreptic Boiler Co., Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 182; 57 L. J. Q. B. 486.

40. Taxation—Bankruptcy—Review—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 112.—Rule 112 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, applies to costs which, by the provisions of the Act, are payable out of the estate, and not to costs which are in the discretion of the court, and which, in consequence of the court exercising its discretion in a particular manner, may come to be paid out of the estate.—Ex parte Jaynes, In re Dowson, Q.B.D., BANKY. 864.

41. Taxation—Counsel—Administration action—Inquiry by chief clerk—Adjournment into court.—If an inquiry in chambers is adjourned into court, the costs of three counsel will not be allowed as between party and party.—Maciver v. Harbison, M.R. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 241.

42. Taxation—Counsel—Refresher—Appeal—Ord. 65, r. 27.—On taxation an addition may, in the discretion of the taxing master, be made to the fees marked on the briefs of counsel, on appeals from the Chancery Division to the Court of Appeal, even if no vivâ voce evidence has been taken. Such addition may, if the taxing master thinks proper, be in the shape of a daily allowance.

Svendsen v. Wallace, 34 W. R. 151, 16 Q. B. D. 27, explained and held to be applicable to appeals from the Chancery Division.—Easton v. London Joint-Stock Bank, C.A. 375—38 Ch. D. 25; 57 L. J. Ch. 329; 58 L. T. 364.

43. Taxation—County court.—The plaintiff commenced a county court action for less than £10, and consulted solicitors with reference to it. The solicitors investigated the case and recommended a settlement, which the plaintiff would not accept. The solicitors returned the papers to the plaintiff, who proceeded with the action in person.

Held, that, on the taxation of the solicitors' costs for services rendered, it was a question for the taxing master whether the solicitors had, in fact, acted in the action.—In re Dod, Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 242.

44. Taxation—Discontinuance before notice of trial—Discretion of master—Ord. 65, r. 27 (6).—Rule 9 of the "Special Allowances" in the scale of 1875 enables the master, in his discretion, to allow the costs of evidence obtained by a defendant, though the plaintiff discontinues his action before notice of trial.—Windham v. Bainton, Q.B.D. 832—21 Q. B. D. 199.

44a. Taxation — London agent — Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.—The Solicitors Act, 1843, gives the court no jurisdiction to order the taxation of part of an agent's bill of costs.

The court has, under its general jurisdiction, power to order the taxation to a bill relating to court business, whether the bill be an agent's bill or a bill delivered by a solicitor to his client; and to refer any part of a bill to taxation.—In re Johnson (2), C.A. 374—37 Ch. D. 433; 57 L. J. Ch. 306; 58 L. T. 692.

45. Taxation—Poor law—Solicitor to guardians—Taxation by clerk of peace—Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 37—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101), s. 39.—Section 39 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, which provides for taxation in certain cases by the clerk of the peace of the costs of a solicitor employed by a board of guardians, does not disentitle a solicitor to an order for taxation, as between solicitor and client, under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843.—Southampton Guardians v. Bell, Q.B.D. 924—21 Q. B. D. 297.

46. Taxation—Reduction by one-sixth—Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 37.—Solicitors paid themselves £20 in full discharge of their costs out of a client's money in their hands. The client changed his solicitors, and obtained an order to tax the costs of the former solicitors, and the amount was reduced on taxation by more than one-sixth.

Held, that the solicitors were not entitled to the costs of taxation.—In re Elwes, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 580.

47. Taxation — Shorthand notes — Appeal.—The disallowance of the costs of shorthand notes by a taxing master, when taxing the costs of the trial in the court below, does not affect the question of their allowance in taxing the costs of an appeal.

The use of shorthand notes by the appellant at the hearing of the appeal is conclusive that the notes are required on the appeal.—Nation v. Hamilton, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 648.

48. Taxation—Solicitor and client—Jurisdiction—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25—Ord. 65, r. 1.—The Court of Chancery formerly had, and the High Court in matters of equitable jurisdiction now has, a general discretionary power to award costs as between solicitor and client.

Quære, whether such power exists in matters of common law jurisdiction.

Mordue v. Palmer, 19 W. R. 86, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 22, approved.

Cockburn v. Edwards, 38 W. R. 446, 18 Ch. D. 449, disapproved.

Decision of Kay, J., affirmed.—Andrews v. Barns, C.A. 705—57 L. J. Ch. 694; 58 L. T. 748.

49. Taxation—Third party—Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 38.—A local board bought land at a price to be fixed by arbitration, it being agreed that the board should pay the costs of the arbitration and reference. An arbitration was held, and the purchase was completed. The board obtained an order to tax the vendor's costs, the order reciting that the board submitted to pay what should be found due on taxation.

Held, that the board, having obtained a third-party order for taxation under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, could not take any objections to the items of the bill of costs which could not have been taken by the vendors.—In re Holliday, CH.D. NOR., J.—58 L. T. 301.

50. Tender—Issue of writ.—A defendant cannot avoid paying the costs of a writ of summons by tendering the amount sued for after issue, but before service, of the writ.—O'Malley v. Kilmallock Guardians, EX.D. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 327.

T. 367.

2. Appeal—Interlocutory order—Equitable jurisdiction—County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99), s. 18.—An appeal upon a question of law lies under section 18 of the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865, from an interlocutory order of a county court in a proceeding within its equitable jurisdiction.—Jonas v. Long, C.A. 315—20 Q. B. D. 564; 57 L. J. Q. B. 298; 58 L. T. 787.

3. Appeal — Interpleader — County Courts Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108), s. 68 — County Courts Act, 1867, s. 13.—In an interpleader issue where neither the money claimed nor the value of the goods nor the proceeds of them exceed £20, no appeal will lie from the county court either with or without leave. Section 13 of the County Courts Act, 1867, enacting that, "with the leave of the judge, an appeal shall be allowed in actions in which an appeal does not now lie," only applies to actions, and not to interpleader issues.—Collis v. Lewis, Q.B.D. 472—20 Q. B. D. 202; 57 L. J. Q. B. 167; 57 L. T. 716.

4. Appeal—Interpleader—Deposit—County Courts Act, 1856, ss. 68, 72.—If the claimant in an interpleader proceeding in a county court deposits the appraised value of the goods deposited, such amount being under £20, he has no right of appeal.—White v. Milne, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 225.

5. Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5—Committal order—"Open court."—A county court judge sat for the purpose of hearing summonses for committal under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, in a small room used at other times as his private room; it communicated with a larger room by a door which was kept open during the hearing of the summonses, and the names of the parties were, if necessary, called in the larger room. The public had access to the smaller room as well as the larger.

Held, that the orders for committal were not made "in open court," and could not be enforced.—Kenyon v. Eastwood, Q.B.D.—57 L. J. Q. B. 455.

6. Evidence—Bankruptcy—vivâ voce evidence.—The rule that leave to use vivâ voce evidence at the hearing of a motion in bankruptcy must be obtained on a separate application before the motion be heard does not apply to county courts.—Ex parte Watkins, In re Wilson, Q.B.D., BANKY.—57 L. T. 201.

7. Execution—High bailiff—Wrongful execution—Recovery of fees—County Courts Act, 1856, s. 88—County Courts Act, 1867, s. 31—County Court Rules, 1886, ord. 27, r. 1—Ultrâ vires.—A high bailiff of a county court sued an execution creditor for four days' possession-money on a wrongful execution levied upon goods other than those of the judgment debtor, and therefore ineffective.

Held, that, under section 83 of the County Courts Act, 1856, taken with section 31 of the County Courts Act, 1867, it is within the discretion of the county court judge to award such fee to the high bailiff as is allowed by schedule C. of the County Courts Act, 1856, taken with schedule B., parts 1 and 3 of the County Court Rules, 1886, subject only to the limitations laid down in ord. 27, r. 1.

Ord. 27, r. 1, is intrâ vires, and does not allow a new fee, but only limits such award up to the date on which the execution creditor admits the title of the claimant to the goods so wrongfully levied upon.

A high bailiff, being a creation of statute, is not in an analogous position to a sheriff.—Thomas v. Peck, Q.B.D. 606—20 Q. B. D. 732.

8. Execution—Neglect of bailiff—Compensation—Prohibition—Estoppel—County Courts Act, 1846, ss. 104, 115.—The county court judge of one court has no power to order the bailiff of a court in a different district who has not levied execution in pursuance of the warrant of the first court to pay compensation under section 115 of the County Courts Act, 1846, or otherwise, to the party injured.

The bailiff of the S. county court appeared before the county court judge of N. to justify his conduct in not making a levy, but was nevertheless ordered by the judge of N. to pay compensation.

Held, that there had not been such an acquiescence in the jurisdiction of the court of N. as would estop the bailiff from obtaining a prohibition against the order of the judge of N.—Ashley v. Norris, Q.B.D. 476—20 Q. B. D. 242; 57 L. J. Q. B. 143; 58 L. T. 86.

9. Jurisdiction — Adding defendant — Remitted action—County Courts Act, 1867, s. 10—Prohibition.—An action in which the plaintiff claimed £150 damages for illegal distress was, on the application of the defendant, remitted to a county court under section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867. The plaintiff then obtained an order from the judge of the county court, under which a new defendant was, against his will, added to the record.

Held, that the county court judge had no power to make such an order.—Mullenelsen v. Coulson, Q.B.D. 524—20 Q. B. D. 667; 57 L. J. Q. B. 334; 58 L. T. 562.

10. Jurisdiction—Admiralty action—Collision—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 3, 5.—By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s. 3, county courts having admiralty jurisdiction were empowered to try (inter alia) actions for damage by collision where the amount claimed did not exceed £300. By section 5, courts appointed by Order in Council are alone to have jurisdiction in each district in any admiralty cause.

Held, that the statute did not take away from county courts not having admiralty jurisdiction the power to try actions for damages for collision between vessels where the amount claimed was under £50.—Scovell v. Beavan, Q.B.D. 301—19 Q. B. D. 428; 56 L. J. Q. B. 604.

11. Jurisdiction—Admiralty action—Collision—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s. 3, sub-section 3—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4.—Damage occasioned by the gear of a sailing ship coming in contact with an object on land does not give a county court jurisdiction within section 3, sub-section 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869.—Robson v. The Kate, Q.B.D. 910—21 Q. B. D. 13.

12. Jurisdiction—Bankruptcy—Disputed claim—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 102.—A. held a mining lease from B., to whom he afterwards mortgaged the lease. A. was adjudicated a bankrupt, and his trustee sought to set aside as fraudulent certain transactions with B., about £13,000 being in dispute.

Held, that the county court judge could not, in the absence of special circumstances, exercise jurisdiction in the case.—Ex parte Haselhurst, In re Beswick, Q.B.D., BANKY.—58 L. T. 591.

13. Jurisdiction—Contempt of court—Fine—Imprisonment—Appeal—Criminal proceedings—County Courts Act, 1856, s. 113. The jurisdiction of the High Court, in reviewing committals for contempt by an inferior court, is limited to the consideration whether there were materials upon which the judge ordering the committal could have reasonably inferred contempt, and whether the form of committal is in accordance with one or other of the forms laid down in section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1846.

Quære, whether a committal for contempt is a criminal matter on which no appeal from the Queen's Bench should have been heard.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 26 W. R. 589) affirmed.—Reg. v. Jordan, C.A. 797; 57 L. J. Q. B. 483.

14. Jurisdiction—Equitable execution—Receiver—Prohibition.—H., by his will, authorised his trustees, at their absolute discretion, at such time or times as they should think proper, to pay and apply the income of a certain sum of money to or for the benefit of G. An action having been brought in the county court against G., in which the plaintiff recovered judgment, the county court judge made an order, by way of equitable execution, appointing a receiver to receive the interest of the said sum, and ordering the trustees to make certain periodical payments until the judgment should be satisfied.

Held, that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to make such order, and that a writ of prohibition must go.—Reg. v. Judge of Lincoln County Court, Q.B.D. 174—20 Q. B. D. 167; 57 L. J. Q. B. 136; 58 L. T. 54.

15. Jurisdiction—Friendly society—Certiorari—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60) ss. 22, 30, sub-section 10.—Under sections 22 and 30, sub-section 10, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, the jurisdiction conferred on the county court is permissive only, and not exclusive.—In re Royal Liver Friendly Society, CH.D. CHI., J. 7—35 Ch. D. 332; 56 L. J. Ch. 821; 56 L. T. 817.

16. Jurisdiction—Landlord and tenant—Notice to quit—County Courts Act, 1856, s. 50—1 Geo. 4, c. 87, s. 1.—A landlord having given a tenant notice to quit for forfeiture by reason of breach of covenants under a lease, brought an action for ejectment in the county court, the rent under the lease being for less than £50.

Held, that, under section 50 of the County Courts Act, 1856, the term or interest of the tenant must be determined by efflux of time or by a legal notice to quit, and that a "legal notice to quit" implied a necessary determination of the lease by law, and not under any private contract.

Held, further, that the construction of the words "legal notice to quit" was analogous to that of the words "regular notice to quit," under 1 Geo. 4, c. 87, and that the old cases decided under that statute applied.—Friend v. Shaw, Q.B.D. 236—20 Q. B. D. 374; 57 L. J. Q. B. 225; 58 L. T. 89.

17. Jurisdiction—New trial—Prohibition.—On an application to a county court judge for a new trial, he refused the application on the two grounds then urged, but intimated that the applicant migght apply on a fresh ground if affidavits could be produced in support of such fresh ground. On the second application, upon fresh grounds, the judge granted the new trial.

Held, that the judge had not "finally determined" the application for a new trial, and that no writ of prohibition could issue to prevent the new trial, as the judge had not exercised his full discretion on the first application, but had only disposed of the two specific grounds on which that application had been based.

Great Northern Railway Co. v. Mossop, 4 W. R. 118, 17 C. B. 130, distinguished.

Per Wills, J.—The High Court has only power to look into the grounds of such applications for new trials to see whether they are such that a judge could have reasonably exercised his discretion upon them, and they cannot interfere with his discretion beyond that limit.—Reg. v. Judge of Greenwich County Court, Q.B.D. 668.

18. Jurisdiction—Specific performance—County Courts Act, 1867, s. 9—Prohibition—Divisible claim.—The county court has no jurisdiction, under the County Courts Act, 1867, s. 9, to entertain a suit for specific performance of a parol agreement to grant a right of way.

Where a plaint contains two claims, one of which is within and the other without the jurisdiction of the county court, a prohibition may be granted as to one only.—Ingleton v. Maudsley, Q.B.D. 477.

19. New trial—Refusal—Second application—Prohibition.—A county court judge who, on the verdict of a jury being given at the trial of an action, hears an application for a new trial and refuses it on grounds then assigned, but gives leave to the applicant to make another application at a later date on fresh materials, is not functus officio, so as to have no jurisdiction to entertain the second application and grant a new trial.—Moxon v. London Tramways Co., Q.B.D.—57 L. J. Q. B. 446.

20. Payment into court—Admission of liability—County Courts Act, 1846, s. 82—County Court Rules, 1886, ord. 4, rr. 11, 12; ord. 51, r. 37.—A defendant in a county court action paid money into court, but stated at the same time in a memorandum addressed to the registrar that the payment was made "without prejudice to the defendant's defence to this action, and while denying the plaintiff's cause of action."

Held, that the payment into court was not an admission of liability, and the defendant was entitled to dispute his liability at the hearing.

Per Wills, J.—Apart from the notice, the defendant was entitled to pay money into court and afterwards to dispute his liability at the hearing, according to the decision in Berdan v. Greenwood, 26 W. R. 902, 1 Ex. D. 251.—Harper v. Davis, Q.B.D. 77—19 Q. B. D. 170; 56 L. J. Q. B. 444.

21. Remitting action—Reduction of claim—Judgment for part—County Courts Act, 1856, s. 26.—By section 26 of the County Courts Act, 1856, where in an action of contract, the claim indorsed on the suit exceeds £50, but "is reduced by payment into court, payment, or admitted set off, or otherwise, to a sum not exceeding £50," a judge may order the case to be tried in a county court.

Held, that the words "or otherwise" include the reduction of a claim after action brought; and that, if the claim is reduced to a sum not exceeding £50 by judgment under order 14 for a portion thereof, there is jurisdiction to order trial in a county court.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 36 W. R. 716, 21 Q. B. D. 15) affirmed.—Gray v. Hopper, C.A. 746—21 Q. B. D. 246; 57 L. J. Q. B. 505.

22. Remitting action—Set-off—Counter-claim—County Courts Act, 1856, s. 26.—The plaintiff claimed for £220. The defendant denied the claim, and counter-claimed for £203. The plaintiff admitted the counter-claim, and applied to a judge at chambers for the remittal of the cause to the county court under section 26 of the County Courts Act, 1856, as for a claim not exceeding £17.

Held, that the judge was right in remitting the action, as the amount in dispute did not exceed £50, and that the fact that the defendant counterclaimed for the amount due to him did not prevent the amount being treated as a set-off against the plaintiff's claim under section 18 of the Judicature Act, 1884.—Lewis v. Lewis, Q.B.D. 63—20 Q. B. D. 56; 57 L. J. Q. B. 38; 57 L. T. 715.

23. Remitting action — Slander—County Courts Act, 1867, s. 10—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 67.—Section 67 of the Judicature Act, 1873, does not limit section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867, and the High Court has power to send down an action of slander to be tried in the county court.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (35 W. R. 613, 19 Q. B. D. 62) affirmed.—Stokes v. Stokes, C.A. 28—19 Q. B. D. 419; 56 L. J. Q. B. 494.

COVENANT:—

1. Deed—Assignment of patent—Consideration—Payment of stamp duty.—By an indenture which recited an agreement to sell a patent for £250 "and for the other considerations herein appearing," the patentees, "in consideration of the premises and of the sum of £250," assigned their rights to a company, and covenanted that the patent might be held and enjoyed by the company "during all the term subsisting therein." The company covenanted to pay royalties on articles manufactured under the patent "while subsisting." The deed contained no covenant to keep on foot the patent or manufacture or sell any articles under the patent. The company omitted to pay stamp duty, and the patent lapsed. The patentees claimed damages against the company, which was in course of voluntary liquidation.

Held, that the omission to pay duty was a bonâ fide mistake, and that there was nothing to show that it was a wilful act on the part of the company; and that, both for that reason and because the assignment was by deed, and the deed contained no covenant to manufacture or sell, a covenant to keep the patent on foot could not be implied. — In re Railway and Electric Appliances Co., CH.D. KAY, J. 730—38 Ch. D. 597; 59 L. T. 22.

2. Restraint of trade—Medical practice—Competition. — An agreement for the sale of a practice between two medical practitioners contained a covenant by the vendor not to solicit any patient within a certain radius, or otherwise directly or indirectly to enter into competition with the purchaser.

Held, that, the object of the covenant being to protect the business bought and paid for, the covenant was not confined to active competition, but prohibited the vendor coming into the defined area, and thereby diminishing the purchaser's fair chance of obtaining a business.—Rogers v. Drury, CH.D. CHI., J. 496—57 L. J. Ch. 504.

3. Restraint of trade—Reasonableness—Divisibility—Injunction.—An agreement for the employment of a servant contained an undertaking that he would not, after leaving the employment, serve or interfere with "any of the customers served or belonging at any time to" the master.

Held, that, whether or not the agreement might be construed so as to extend to persons who became customers of the master after the servant left his employment, it was at any rate good as to persons who were customers of the master during the employment of the servant, and that it was severable and enforceable as to such last-mentioned persons; and that an injunction must be granted to restrain the servant from serving or interfering with such last-mentioned persons.—Baines v. Geary, CH.D. NOR., J. 98—35 Ch. D. 154; 56 L. J. Ch. 935; 56 L. T. 567.

4. Restraint of trade—Reasonableness—Divisibility—Injunction.—A foreman tailor covenanted with his employer not to leave his service or enter the service or employ of any other persons, or enter into any engagement or be concerned or interested in carrying on, either on his own account or otherwise, any business whatsoever within the distance of one mile of No. 61, High Holborn, or any other place of business of the said employer which he then or thereafter might have during the continuance of the term of three years, or afterwards during the further period of two years.

Held, that the restraint imposed by the covenant was unreasonable, and that the covenant was not divisible into two parts, and could not be enforced.—Baker v. Hedgecock, CH.D. CHI., J. 840.

5. Restraint of trade—Reasonableness—Retiring partner.—A deed executed on the dissolution of a partnership between E. D., E. A. D., and J. D., contained the following covenant by J. D.:—"The said J. D. (1) to retire wholly and absolutely from the partnership; and, (2) so far as the law allows, from the trade or business thereof in all its branches; and (3) not to trade, act, or deal in any way so as to either directly or indirectly affect E. D. and E. A. D."

Held, as to (2) and (3), that they were too vague to be enforced, and were, therefore, void.

Held, also, as to (3), that it was a covenant entered into for the protection of E. D. and E. A. D. personally, and that it therefore did not pass to their assignees with the goodwill of the business.

Per Cotton, L.J.—It is still the law that a covenant in general restraint of trade, unlimited both as to time and space, is void.

Quære.—Whether, having regard to altered circumstances which now exist in England, the old rule still prevails.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.—Davies v. Davies, C.A. 86—36 Ch. D. 359; 56 L. J. Ch. 962; 58 L. T. 205.

CRIMINAL LAW:—

1. Embezzlement—Indictment—Evidence—Separate counts.—A. was indicted on three counts for having embezzled money on three occasions. In support of the first count it was proved that A., who was employed by shipowners, received money for carrying animals, which money he ought to have paid to the prosecutors' cashier. In support of the second count it was proved that he was supplied with tickets for issue to passengers, purporting to be numbered consecutively, and that certain tickets had been clipped as if used, but that he had not paid to the cashier any money in respect of them. The jury found a verdict of guilty on the first and second counts, and of not guilty on the third count.

Held, that the jury were entitled, in considering one charge, to take into account the evidence on the other charges.—Reg. v. Stephens, C.C.R.—58 L. T. 776.

2. False pretences—Word competition—Promise of prizes.—The prisoner inserted advertisements in newspapers offering prizes for word competitions, the entrance fees to be sent to the "Rev. A. B., Trowbridge." There was no such person at Trowbridge.

Money sent in consequence of the advertisements was received by the prisoner.

Held, that the prisoner had been guilty of obtaining money by false pretences.—Reg. v. Randell, C.C.R. —57 L. T. 718.

3. Intimidation—Picketing—Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 7.—An intimation conveyed in a letter to an employer that his shop would be picketed, in language so threatening as "to make such employer afraid," amounts to "intimidation" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, whether the picketing amounts to an unlawful "watching or besetting" within sub-section 4 or not.—Judge v. Bennett, Q.B.D. 103.

4. Larceny—Trick—Betting.—The prosecutor deposited money with the prisoner, who appeared to be a bookmaker, to abide the result of a race. During the race the prisoner went away.

Held, that there was evidence to go to the jury of larceny at common law.—Reg. v. Buckmaster, C.C.R. 701—20 Q. B. D. 182; 57 L. J. M. C. 25; 57 L. T. 720.

5. Nuisance—Fine—Certiorari.—When a corporation is convicted on an indictment for a nuisance removed into the Queen's Bench Division by certiorari, the court, in imposing a fine, will not take into consideration the costs incurred by the prosecutors.—Reg. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 771.

6. Restitution of property—False pretences—Purchase in market overt—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 100.—A bonâ fide purchaser for value in market overt of goods obtained by his vendor under a contract of sale induced by fraud, even if he purchased before any avoidance of the contract, is liable, under section 100 of the Larceny Act, 1861, when the person obtaining the goods by false pretences has been convicted, to have an order of restitution of the goods to the original owner made against him if he has possession of the goods at the time of the conviction.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 238, 18 Q. B. D. 322) affirmed.

DAMAGES:—

1. Patent—Infringement.—In an action by assignees of a patent for making horseshoe nails for damages for infringement, the assignors not having granted licences, but having manufactured and sold the nails themselves, the defendants are liable for substantial damages, the measure of damages being the profit which would have been made if the assignees had effected the sales made by the defendants.—United Horseshoe Nail Co. v. Stewart, H.L.—13 App. 401.

2. Principal and agent—Warranty of authority.—In an action against a marine insurance company carrying on business in the United States the plaintiff obtained judgment for £1,000 in default of appearance. Negotiations for a settlement afterwards took place between the plaintiff and the defendants' agents in England, and the agents, by mistake and in good faith, told the plaintiff that they were authorised to offer £300 in settlement of his claim. It afterwards appeared that this was not the case, and the plaintiff was unable to enforce the agreement. The plaintiff then sued the agents for damages for breach of their warranty of authority.

Held, that the measure of damages was the plaintiff's loss of the gain which he would have derived from the contract which the defendants had warranted themselves to be authorised to make, and that, the judgment being of no value against the insurance company, the plaintiff was entitled to £300 in addition to the expenses of negotiating the compromise.—Meek v. Wendt, Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 126.

3. Railway—Negligence—Personal injury—Nervous shock.—A servant of a railway company negligently permitted a carriage in which the plaintiff was riding to cross the railway by a level crossing when it was not necessary to do so. The plaintiff narrowly escaped personal injury from a passing train, but sustained a nervous shock and mental injury through fright.

Held, that the damage sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence of the defendants' servant was too remote, and that a verdict for the plaintiff could not be sustained.—Victorian Railway Co. v. Coultas, P.C.—13 App. 222; 57 L. J. P. C. 69; 58 L. T. 390.

4. Sheriff—Execution—Rent—8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1.—In an action brought by a landlord against a sheriff, under 8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, for the removal and sale of goods taken in execution, without paying a year's rent, it is not sufficient for the defendant to show, in mitigation of damages, that the goods realised less than the amount of the rent, but he must prove that their actual value to the landlord at the time of removal was less.—Thomas v. Mirehouse, Q.B.D. 104—19 Q. B. D. 563; 56 L. J. Q. B. 653.

5. Shipping — Collision — Abandonment.—In a collision action the court found that the defendants were to blame, but that the plaintiffs had improperly abandoned their ship after the collision, in consequence of which abandonment it sank, but was afterwards raised by the plaintiffs, when it might have been beached.

The court directed the registrar, in assessing the damages, to disallow the cost of raising the plaintiffs' ship.—The Hansa, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. T. 530.

6. Shipping — Collision — Damage to cargo—Interest.—The practice of the Admiralty Court to allow interest upon the damages awarded is a long-established and sound practice, and cannot be overruled.

In an action to recover damages for injury to a ship, tried in the Queen's Bench Division, and transferred by consent to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division for the purpose of having the damages assessed, interest was allowed upon the amount of the damages awarded from the date of the loss until payment.

Held, that the defendant had, by his consent to the transfer, agreed that the admiralty practice should be applied.

In an action in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, in respect of which, before the Judicature Acts, the Admiralty Court would have had no jurisdiction, interest was allowed upon the amount of the damages awarded from the date of the loss until payment.

Held, that the defendant, by not applying to have the action transferred to the Queen's Bench Division, had agreed to the damages being assessed according to the admiralty practice.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (36 W. R. 191, 12 P. D. 204) affirmed.—The Baron Aberdour, The Gertrude, C.A. 616—13 P. D. 105.

7. Shipping—Collision—Loss of cargo.—Where a ship is prevented by a collision from fulfilling a beneficial agreement to collect cargo and carry it on a specified voyage, the loss of any definite advantage which, but for the collision, would have arisen from such agreement is to be taken into account in estimating the damages sustained by the shipowner in consequence of the collision.—The Argentino, P.D. & A.D. 814—13 P. D. 61; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 25; 58 L. T. 643.

8. Shipping—Collision—Loss of life—Both ships to blame—Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), s. 1—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 9.—A passenger in a public conveyance who receives an injury is not deprived of his remedy by reason of the contributory negligence of those in charge of the conveyance; and therefore, where there has been a collision between two ships, contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the one ship is no defence to an action brought under Lord Campbell's Act by the representatives of one of its passengers against the owners of the other ship.

Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, and Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 23 W. R. 295, L. R. 10 Ex. 47, overruled.

The admiralty rule as to joint liability for joint negligence does not apply to actions brought under Lord Campbell's Act for damages arising out of a collision between two ships.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 314, 12 P. D. 58) affirmed.—Mills v. Armstrong, H.L. 870—13 App. 1; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 65; 58 L. T. 423.

9. Warranty—Re-sale—Costs of action by sub-purchaser.—The defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiffs coal of a particular description, knowing that it was to be resold under the same description. The coal delivered by the defendant and resold by the plaintiffs did not answer the description, but this difference could not have been ascertained by inspection. The purchasers sued the plaintiffs for breach of contract, and the plaintiffs informed the defendant of the action, but the defendant repudiated liability. A verdict was found against the plaintiffs, who then sued the defendants for breach of contract.

Held, that the costs of defending the former action could be recovered against the defendant.—Hammond v. Bussey, C.A.—20 Q. B. D. 79; 57 L. J. Q. B. 58.

DEED:—

1. Assignment for benefit of creditors—Execution creditor—Burden of proof.—Where a trustee, under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, sets up the deed against an execution creditor, the burden of proving that the deed is irrevocably binding on the execution creditor is on the trustee.—Adnitt v. Hands, Q.B.D.—57 L. T. 370.

2. Consideration—Illegality—Fraud on creditors—Voluntary conveyance—13 Eliz. c. 5—27 Eliz. c. 4.—A. conveyed all his real estate upon trust to sell and pay his debts, and to pay any ultimate surplus to trustees for the separate use of his wife for life, and after her death upon trust for their children in equal shares as tenants in common.

Held, in a suit by a purchaser for value at a sale in execution of A.'s interest in part of the land conveyed, that the conveyance was neither revocable nor a fraud on creditors, nor void under 13 Eliz. c. 5.—Godfrey v. Poole, P.C.—13 App. 497; 58 L. T. 685.

3. General words — Mortgage — Freeholds—Copyholds.—By a mortgage deed the mortgagor conveyed to the mortgagee in fee simple "all and every the estate, right, title, property, and interest of the mortgagor of and in all and every those two fields or parcels of land, containing together about twenty-two acres, . . . situate, and abutting upon the main road, at H., . . . and all and every other, if any, the land, hereditaments, and premises at H. aforesaid, of, in, or to which the mortgagor hath any estate, right, title, property, or interest." The two fields were freehold, but a small strip of adjacent plantation, in which the mortgagor was entitled to two undivided thirds, and which, with the fields, nearly made up twenty-two acres, was copyhold.

Held, that the copyhold land passed under the general words.—Early v. Rathbone, CH.D. KEK., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 652; 58 L. T. 517.

4. Recital — Operative part — Inconsistency. — A marriage settlement contained a recital that land was subject to a charge, and to a term of 1,500 years. The operative part of the deed referred to a schedule in which lands situate in four townships, and subject to the charge, were particularly described, and there were general words referring to all other lands belonging to the settlor in those townships. The settlor at the time of the settlement was entitled to other lands in two of the townships of about the same value as the scheduled property, but subject to different charges.

Held, that the operation of the general words was confined to the lands subject to the charges mentioned in the recitals.—Earl Grey v. Earl of Durham, CH.D. STI., J.—57 L. T. 164.

5. Registration—Middlesex—Memorial—Attestation—Copyhold — Enfranchisement — Affidavit — Commission—7 Anne, c. 20, ss. 1, 5, 17—Oaths in Chancery Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 78,) s. 2.—An enfranchisement deed is not a deed merely conveying copyhold estates, but one conveying the freehold, and is not within the exception of 7 Anne, c. 20, s. 17, excluding from registration copyhold estates.

It is not necessary that one of the witnesses attesting the memorial of a deed to be enrolled in the registry under 7 Anne, c. 20, s. 5, shall be a witness to the execution of the deed by a grantor, and it is sufficient if he be a witness to the execution of the deed by a grantee.

A London Commissioner to administer oaths in chancery appointed under section 2 of the Oaths in Chancery Act, 1853, has power to administer the oath required by 7 Anne, c. 20, s. 5.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 35 W. R. 808) affirmed.—Reg. v. Lord Truro, C.A. 775—58 L. T. 77.

6. Registration—Middlesex—Priority—Mortgage—Will—Notice to agent—7 Anne, c. 20, ss. 1, 5, 17.—A., who died in 1871, by her will devised real estate in Middlesex to trustees upon trust for sale. The will was not registered in Middlesex. The heir-at-law of the testatrix afterwards mortgaged the property to different mortgagees, and registered the mortgages, having prepared the deeds himself. The surviving trustee received the rents of the property till 1878, when he died; and in 1879 a receiver was appointed in an action to administer the estate. The property was sold in 1882 under an order of the court, notice of the mortgages was given to the purchasers, and the purchase-moneys were paid into court, subject to the claims of the mortgagees. The heir-at-law died in 1885. As the mortgages were for previous debts, the heir-at-law had acted as agent of all the mortgagees.

Held, that persons claiming under 7 Anne, c. 20 with notice of the will could not set up the title of the heir-at-law, and that the mortgagees were affected by the notice which the heir-at-law possessed.—In re Edwards and Green, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 792.

7. Seal—Company—Transfer of shares.—By the articles of association of a company, transfers of its shares were to be made by deed. A., a shareholder, deposited certificates of certain of its shares with B., to secure a loan, and also signed and handed over to B. a blank transfer of the shares. There was no seal or wafer on the transfer opposite to A.'s signature, but only a circle printed on the paper inclosing the words, "Place for a seal." The document purported to be attested by a witness as having been "signed, sealed, and delivered" in his presence, but there was no evidence proving that the document was signed, sealed, and delivered as a deed.

Held, that, in the absence of such evidence, the printed circle inclosing the words "Place for a seal" did not supply the place of a seal so as to make the document a deed effectual to pass the shares.—In re Balkis Consolidated Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 392—58 L. T. 300.

DISCOVERY:—

1. Affidavit of documents—Statement of defence—Ord. 19, r. 6—Ord. 31, rr. 1, 12.—There is no absolute rule against ordering the defendant to make an affidavit of documents before delivering a statement of defence, but the court has a discretion in the matter.—Edelston v. Russell, CH.D. KEK., J.—57 L. T. 927.

2. Inspection—Bankers' Books Inspection Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 11), s. 7—Ex parte application—Affidavit.—Section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, gives to a litigant party a certain extended right of inspection by enabling him before trial to inspect, and take copies of entries in, banker's books; but such right exists only for, and must be strictly limited to, the purposes of the proceedings.

Section 7 gives the court jurisdiction—to be exercised with caution—to make an order for inspection on an application made without notice to "the bank or any other party," and the words "any other party" include any party to the action.

Affidavit evidence in support of the application for liberty to inspect may be dispensed with if it is obvious from the issues raised by the pleadings that the entries in the banker's books must be material.

Quære, whether section 7 can be used for the purposes of obtaining "discovery" in the strict sense of the term.

3. Inspection—Company—Register of mortgages—Register of debentures—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 16), s. 45—Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118), s. 28.—The statutory right of a shareholder in a railway company to inspect the register of mortgages under section 45 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and to inspect the debenture stockholders' register under section 28 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, includes a right to take copies of, or extracts from, such registers.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.—Mutter v. Eastern and Midlands Railway Co., C.A. 401—38 Ch. D. 92; 57 L. J. Ch. 615.

4. Inspection—Discretion of judge—Affidavit—Costs—Ord. 31, r. 12.—On an application for discovery of documents under ord. 31, r. 12, the court has discretion to refuse discovery which it considers cannot be reasonably expected to be of any use to the applicant. On such an application it is not the practice of the court to require or allow affidavits to be made in order to enable the court to decide whether there ought to be discovery; but the court, in order to come to a conclusion, must look at the pleadings, and may also look at any affidavits for some other purpose already made in the action. The party intending to use such affidavits must give notice of his intention to the other side, and specify the particular affidavits or particular passages in affidavits that he relies on. A general notice to read all such affidavits ought not to be given, and will render the party giving such general notice to read liable to pay the costs occasioned thereby.—Downing v. Falmouth United Sewerage Board, C.A. 437—37 Ch. D. 224; 57 L. J. Ch. 234; 58 L. T. 296.

5. Inspection — Privilege — Correspondence with solicitor — Company — Action by shareholder.—The plaintiff in a shareholder's action against a company is entitled to discovery of professional communications between the company and its legal advisers relating to the subject-matter of the action, when such communications are paid for out of the funds of the company.—Gouraud v. Edison Bell Telephone Co., CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 498.

6. Inspection—Privilege—Recovery of land—Purchaser for value without notice—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24, sub-section 2—Ord. 31, rr. 1, 14.—An action was brought in the Chancery Division for the recovery of land and for the delivery up of title deeds. Upon a summons for production of documents, the defendants raised the objection that they were purchasers for value without notice, and therefore privileged from producing the documents, though they did not in their affidavits aver that the documents related solely to their own title, and did not in any way tend to prove the title of the plaintiff.

Held, that as the objection was, before the Judicature Act, 1873, allowed by the Court of Chancery in respect of its auxiliary jurisdiction only, and not in respect of its concurrent jurisdiction, it could not now be sustained when the court has a complete jurisdiction over the whole action, and that the defendants were not protected by section 24, sub-section 2, of the Judicature Act, 1873.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 34 W. R. 636, 33 Ch. D. 323) affirmed.—Ind v. Emmerson, H.L. 243—12 App. 300; 56 L. J. Ch. 989; 57 L. T. 778.

7. Inspection—Privilege—Reports of agents—Professional communications.—In an action against a railway company for work done and materials supplied, the defendants objected to produce for the plaintiff's inspection their engineer's report as to the plaintiff's claim, correspondence with their servants and agents as to the defence of the action, and extracts from minutes of meetings of the board with reference to the contemplated litigation.

Held, that the defendants must produce the engineer's report, and all correspondence, except that with their solicitors, but not the minutes of the meetings.—Worthington v. Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Co., EX.D. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 310.

8. Inspection—Privilege—Shorthand notes of former action.—A coal mine was leased by the trustees of a charity to W., with a provision that a belt of coal should be left by the lessee at the boundaries of the mine of sufficient thickness to keep out the water. An adjoining mine was also leased by the trustees, with a similar provision, to a company which worked another adjoining mine belonging to an adjoining owner. The mines in the occupation of the company were damaged by flooding alleged to have resulted from the improper working by W. of the mine leased to him, which caused the water to flow into that part of the company's mines not leased to them by the trustees, and thence into the mine which was leased to them by the trustees. W. died, and an action was brought by the company against his executors for damages for injury to the company as lessees, by the flooding of the mines in their occupation, but the action was compromised on payment of compensation. On behalf of the executors shorthand writer's notes of the proceedings were taken. An action was afterwards brought for the administration of W.'s estate, the executors being defendants, and the trustees of the charity put in a claim for damages for injury to them as owners of the mine leased to the company by the flooding of the mine.

Held, that the trustees were entitled to the production of the shorthand writer's notes taken on behalf of the executors in the former action.—Robson v. Worswick, CH.D. NOR., J. 685—38 Ch. D. 370.

9. Interrogatories—Libel—Newspaper—Names of correspondents.—In an action against the publisher of a newspaper for a libel contained in a letter from a correspondent and in a leading article thereon, the defence was that the alleged libel consisted of an accurate report of certain public proceedings and fair comment thereon.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to interrogate the defendant as to the names of the persons on whose information the reports were based, or the name of the correspondent who wrote the letter, or as to the original manuscript of the letter.—Hennessy v. Wright (2), C.A. 879.

10. Production—Sealing up books—Unsealing—Burden of proof—Principal and agent—Account.—In an action by a principal against an agent for an account, the plaintiff obtained an order for an affidavit of documents, and the defendant obtained leave to seal up such portions of the books as were irrelevant.

Held, that the burden of proving that any portions of the books ought to be unsealed was on the plaintiff. —Jones v. Andrews, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 843.

DIVORCE:—

1. Adultery—Desertion—Supplementary petition.—In a wife's suit for dissolution of marriage, the husband's adultery was proved, but the desertion alleged in the petition was proved to have been for less than two years. The hearing was adjourned, and, the respondent not having returned to cohabitation, the court, on a supplemental petition filed a year afterwards, and charging desertion, granted a decree for a dissolution of marriage.—Wood v. Wood (2), P.D. & A.D.—13 P. D. 22; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 48.

2. Adultery of petitioner—Condonation—Discretion of court—Damages.—A jury found a wife guilty of adultery with the co-respondent, assessing the damages against him at £300. The husband had, six years before, committed adultery with a maid-servant in the house where the wife resided, and she had condoned the offence.

Held, that the court ought, in the exercise of its discretion, to dismiss the husband's petition, and that the petitioner could not recover any damages.—Story v. Story and O'Connor, P.D. & A.D. 190—12 P. D. 196; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 15; 57 L. T. 536.

3. Alimony pendente lite—Decree nisi—Appeal.—When there has been the verdict of a jury finding a wife guilty of adultery, the wife's right to alimony primâ facie ceases, subject to a discretion in the judge to order it to be continued pending a new trial if he considers it reasonable to do so.

4. Alimony pendente lite—Petition—Substituted service.—On a motion for substituted service of a petition for alimony pendente lite, the court dispensed with further service on proof that a copy of the petition had been sent to the address of the respondent's agent upon whom the petition in the suit had been served.—Odevaine v. Odevaine, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. T. 564.

5. Bastardising issue—Irish divorce bill—Striking out paragraphs.—On a husband's bill for a divorce a paragraph containing allegations tending to bastardise a child of the wife born during the marriage, and when access was possible, will be struck out.—In re Hewat's Divorce Bill, H.L.—12 App. 312.

6. Cruelty—Irish divorce bill.—Any act which would be held to constitute legal cruelty in England will be held to be cruelty in proceedings on an Irish divorce bill.—In re Gifford's Divorce Bill, H.L.—12 App. 361.

7. Custody of children—Cruelty and adultery of father—Infants Guardianship Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 27), s. 7.—On the hearing of a wife's petition for dissolution on the ground of adultery and cruelty of a gross character, which was undefended, the court made a decree nisi for dissolution, giving the wife the custody of the children, and in terms of section 7 of the Infants Guardianship Act, 1886, declared the husband, who had received notice of the application, "unfit to have the custody of the children of the marriage."—Skinner v. Skinner, P.D. & A.D. 912—13 P. D. 90; 58 L. T. 923.

8. Desertion—Departure to avoid prosecution—Penal servitude.—Where a man leaves his wife under circumstances which would make his absence amount to desertion if continued for two years, the fact that he is subsequently arrested and imprisoned will not prevent the two years running.

A., who had been guilty of embezzlement, left his wife in January, 1886, stating that he was going to Ireland for a week to shoot. He had been committing adultery with a woman, and had arranged to take her to Constantinople. He, however, left for New South Wales, and when arrested was living with another woman. He was brought back, tried, and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

Held, that A. had been guilty of desertion.—Drew v. Drew, P.D. & A.D. 927—13 P. D. 97; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 64; 58 L. T. 923.

9. Desertion—Restitution of conjugal rights—Decree—Non-compliance—Previous adultery—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 68), s. 5.—The effect of section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, is to render the effect of non-compliance with an order for restitution of conjugal rights in all respects the same as desertion for two years, and therefore, where a husband had not complied with such order, and had committed adultery before the date of the petition on which such order was made, the court held that the wife was entitled to a decree nisi for dissolution—Bigwood v. Bigwood, P.D. & A.D. 928—13 P. D. 89; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 80; 58 L. T. 642.

10. Desertion—Separation by consent—Adultery.—A husband and wife separated by consent in consequence of his inability to maintain her. The husband on several occasions wrote letters asking for money. In one letter the wife offered to return to cohabitation, but the husband refused. The correspondence had ceased for more than two years, and the wife discovered that the husband had for several years cohabited with another woman.

Held, that the husband had been guilty of desertion.—Smith v. Smith, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 639.

11. Evidence—Identity of co-respondent.—In an undefended divorce suit, where leave to proceed without making a co-respondent has not been given, the co-respondent's identity must be proved.—Duff v. Duff and Lindsay, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. T. 389.

12. Misconduct of petitioner—Wilful neglect—Delay—Appeal—Trial without a jury—Rehearing—Divorce Rules, r. 62.—A decree of dissolution of marriage was refused to a husband whose wife had been guilty of adultery, and who, after living with her for eleven years, had broken up the home in order to get rid of her because of her drunken habits, and had made no inquiries about her for eight years, when he discovered she had been cohabiting with another man during the interval, and five years afterwards he filed a petition,

By rule 62 of the Divorce Rules an application for the rehearing of a cause should be made to a divisional court.—Heyes v. Heyes and Mason, P.D. & A.D. 527—13 P. D. 11; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 22; 57 L. T. 815.

13. Permanent maintenance—Irish divorce bill.—On a husband's bill for a divorce the wife's adultery was proved, but it appeared that the husband had not provided a home for the latter when they were separated by order of his medical attendant.

The House of Lords directed the insertion in the bill of a clause making a provision for the wife.—In re A.'s Divorce Bill, H.L.—12 App. 366.

14. Permanent maintenance—Will—Construction—Estate in fee simple—Restraint on alienation—Forfeiture—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 32), s. 1.—A wife petitioned for permanent maintenance after the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery and cruelty. The husband was entitled under his father's will to the rents of certain freehold property, and to certain shares vested in trustees, upon trust for his "sole use and benefit," and to be assigned to him as soon as conveniently might be after his father's death. The will directed that, if either of the testator's sons should die unmarried and without issue, his share should go to the survivors, and that neither of his sons should have power to mortgage, sell, alien, charge, or incumber any part of the property, and that in the event of either of them doing so the trustees should stand possessed of his share.

Held, that the respondent took an estate in fee simple under the will, and that the provision for forfeiture was void.—Corbett v. Corbett, P.D. & A.D.—13 P. D. 136.

15. Variation of settlements—Power of appointment—Appointment of new trustees—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5.—Under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, the court has power to deprive one of the parties to the marriage settlement of the powers of appointment amongst the children of the marriage, but quære as to the power of appointment of new trustees.

The court deprived a guilty wife of the power of appointment amongst the children of the marriage, but, the wife being allowed to retain an income of £100 a year under the settlement, refused to deprive her of the right to appoint or join in the appointment of new trustees of the settlement—Boseville v. Boseville and Craven, P.D. & A.D. 913—13 P. DOMICILE:—

1. Abandonment of domicile of choice—Revival of domicile of origin.—In order to lose the domicile of choice once acquired, and to revive the domicile of origin, it is not only necessary that the person should form an intention to leave his domicile of choice, but he must have left it with the intention of leaving it permanently.

Decision of Stirling, J., affirmed.—Chalmers v. Wingfield, C.A. 344—36 Ch. D. 400; 57 L. T. 806.

2. British protectorate—Egypt.—A., who was a Chaldean Catholic having his domicile of origin in Turkey, resided permanently at Cairo until his death, and acquired there the status of a protected British subject.

Held, that A. did not obtain an English domicile.—Abdul Messih v. Farra, P.C.—13 App. 431.

3. Residence.—A. was born in Scotland in 1832 of Scotch parents. In 1848 he came to London, and in 1855 he went to Calcutta, where he was for many years a partner in a mercantile firm. In 1877 he gave up his business, returned to England, and became a member of the Indian Council. He lived in England till his death in 1887. He had made a will at Calcutta, disposing only of personal property in England. He had no property in Scotland.

Held, that A.'s domicile was English.—Barnes v. Smith, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 578.

EASEMENT:—

Watercourse—Rent.—The plaintiff was lessee of a farm, and also of a mill, which was supplied with water flowing in a natural watercourse. The defendants, who were owners of a slate quarry adjoining the plaintiff's farm, made an agreement with him whereby he permitted them to use the water at a certain rent. The defendants were to keep the watercourse and troughs in repair, and were to have free access to the farm. The agreement was terminable by three months' notice on either side. In 1876 the plaintiff's lease of the farm expired, but he continued to occupy the mill, and the farm was leased to D. In 1885 D. sought to exclude the defendants from the land. The defendants had up to that time paid the rent, and no notice to determine the agreement had been given. The defendants then refused to pay any more rent. The plaintiff sued the defendants for arrears of rent.

Held, that the defendants were entitled to judgment.—Jones v. Dorothea Co., Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 80.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW:—

1. Benefice—Institution—Discretion of bishop—Welsh language—1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, s. 104.—The bishop has a right to refuse to institute a presentee who is not a fit clerk to a vacant benefice.

A clerk was presented to a vacant benefice within a Welsh diocese, though situate in England, who was ignorant of, and refused to be examined in, the Welsh language.

Held, that the presentee was not a fit clerk by reason of his ignorance of the Welsh language; and that the bishop was the sole judge as to the linguistic requirements of the parish, and was not bound to hold any public or formal inquiry. — Marquis of Abergavenny v. Bishop of Llandaff, Q.B.D. 859—20 Q. B. D. 460; 57 L. J. Q. B. 223; 58 L. T. 812.

2. Benefice—Resignation—Revocation—Condition—Illegality — Simony. — A deed of resignation of a benefice executed and sent to the bishop is valid, though not made before a notary public, the bishop having power to dispense with that formality.

A resignation sent at the bishop's request is valid without any formal acceptance by the bishop.

The bishop may fix a future time for the acceptance and operation of a resignation without transgressing the rule that a resignation, except in the case of an exchange, must be made purè, sponte, absolutè, et simpliciter.

A resignation made at the request of the bishop to avoid scandal is valid.

A resignation accepted by the bishop, but postponed by him so as to enable the clerk to receive the next payment of tithe rent-charge, is not invalid as simoniacal.—Reichel v. Bishop of Oxford, C.A. 307—35 Ch. D. 48; 56 L. J. Ch. 1023; 56 L. T. 539.

3. Communion table—Side chapel.—Although the rubric and the 82nd canon contemplate only one communion table in a church, they do not expressly prohibit a second one, and a faculty should be granted for a second communion table where, on the ground of convenience and economy, it is desirable to introduce one in a side chapel as subsidiary to the performance of the service of the church as prescribed by law.—In re Trinity Church, Stroud Green, CONS. 288—12 P. D. 199.

4. Churchwarden—Attending service—Jurisdiction—5 & 6 Ed. 6, c. 1, s. 2.—A churchwarden has no right to forcibly prevent an inhabitant from entering a church to attend service, even if he thinks that the latter cannot be conveniently accommodated; and he is amenable to the jurisdiction of a temporal court.

The 5 & 6 Ed. 6, c. 1, s. 2, confers a right of going to church on those who are obliged by the Act to do so.—Taylor v. Timson, Q.B.D.—20 Q. B. D. 671; 57 L. J. Q. B. 216.

5. Convocation—Election of proctor—Archbishop—Mandamus.—The President of Convocation having exercised his discretion in the case of a disputed election of proctors to represent an archdeaconry at Convocation, the High Court has no jurisdiction to inquire into or interfere with such decision.—Reg. v. Archbishop of York, Q.B.D. 718—20 Q. B. D. 740; 57 L. J. Q. B. 396.

6. Monition—Disobedience—Suspension—Writ de contumace capiendo—5 Eliz. c. 23, s. 10—53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 1.—The effect of the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, is to substitute the writ de contumace capiendo for the writ de excommunicato capiendo, and to apply to the former writ all proceedings and provisions applicable to the latter; and therefore the methods of release from imprisonment under the writ de contumace capiendo are not limited to those provided in the statute, but include the method by submission and satisfaction applicable in cases under the old writ.

A writ de contumace capiendo for disobedience to an order of suspension was issued after the period of suspension had elapsed.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the writ was rightly issued.—Ex parte Bell Cox, C.A. 209—20 Q. B. D. 1; 57 L. J. Q. B. 98; 58 L. T. 323.

ELECTION LAW:—

1. Municipal election—Alderman—Vote of mayor-elect—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 60, sub-section 3.—By section 60, sub-section 3, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, "An outgoing alderman, although mayor-elect, shall not vote."

An outgoing alderman, having been elected mayor, and having taken the declaration, voted in the election of alderman for the borough.

Held, that the vote of the mayor-elect was invalid.—Hounsell v. Suttill, Q.B.D. 147—19 Q. B. D. 498; 56 L. J. Q. B. 502; 57 L. T. 102.

2. Municipal election—Nomination paper—Signatures of burgesses—Description—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 241, schedule 3, part 2, rr. 2, 5, Form T., schedule 7.—The ordinary signatures of burgesses, together with their number on the burgess roll, as proposers on the nomination paper of a candidate at a municipal election are sufficient, provided they can be commonly understood to refer to the corresponding names on the burgess roll.—Bowden v. Besley, Q.B.D. 889—57 L. J. Q. B. 473.

3. Municipal election—Occupation—Service franchise—Representation of the People Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 3), s. 3—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 9.—A voter who has been placed on the Parliamentary register for a borough as an inhabitant occupier by virtue of the service franchise, is not thereby entitled to be placed on the burgess roll under section 9 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which section requires occupation "as owner or tenant" in a legal and not merely a physical sense.—McClean v. Prichard, Q.B.D. 508—20 Q. B. D. 285; 58 L. T. 337.

4. Municipal election—Returning officer—Mandamus—Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), s. 2, schedule I., rr. 45, 46—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, ss. 34, 58, 87.—R. and P. were nominated as candidates for the office of councillor of one ward of a borough. P. objected to R.'s nomination because he was then an alderman. The mayor disallowed the objection, but P. claimed to be elected, whatever the result of the poll. The poll showed a majority for R., and the numbers were announced by the mayor. On the following day the returning officer, having considered P.'s objection, declared P. to be elected.

Held, that the returning officer had no jurisdiction to determine the question of R.'s disqualification, which question must be raised by an election petition; and that P. had not been duly elected, and was not entitled to a mandamus to the mayor and corporation to compel them to receive his votes at corporation meetings.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 158, 18 Q. B. D. 349) affirmed.—Pritchard v. Mayor, &c., of Bangor, H.L.—13 App. 241; 57 L. J. Q. B. 313; 58 L. T. 502.

5. Parliamentary election—Claim—Amendment—Description of house—Discretion of revising barrister—Parliamentary Registration (Ireland) Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 17), s. 27.—A claim to vote as a rated occupier must specify the number (if any) of the house occupied. The omission of such number may be supplied by the revising barrister; but the amendment of a claim is a matter entirely for his discretion.—Lavery v. Kingsberry, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 387.

6. Parliamentary election—Claim—Amendment—Lodger—Rent.—A claimant to vote as a lodger filled in the column "amount of rent paid" with the words "part salary."

Held, that the claim was defective, and could not be amended.—Jones v. Beveridge (1), C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 380.

7. Parliamentary election—Claim—Lodger—Rent—"Estimated rent."—A claimant to vote as a lodger inserted under the column "amount of rent paid" the words, "Estimated rent, 5s. weekly."

Held, that the claimant was not entitled to be registered.—Bradley v. Colquhoun, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 378.

8. Parliamentary election — Disqualification — Alms—Reform Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 36.—A. occupied an almshouse in a borough and received 6*s.* per week out of a charitable fund for the maintenance of the inmates of such almshouse, the charity being regulated by a statute which provided that the inmates should be persons who, from age, ill-health, accident, or infirmity, were unable to maintain themselves.

Held, that, by section 36 of the Reform Act, A. was disqualified from being registered as a borough voter.—Edwards v. Lloyd, Q.B.D.—20 Q. B. D. 302; 57 L. J. Q. B. 121; 58 L. T. 409.

9. Parliamentary election—Objection—Description of objection—Registration Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 15), s. 18.—A notice of objection to a county voter was signed as follows:—"G. C., of Churchyard, on the list of Parliamentary voters for the parish of Petersfield."

Held, that the notice was bad, as the objector's place of abode was insufficiently described under section 18 of the Registration Act, 1885.—Humphrey v. Earle, Q.B.D. 510—20 Q. B. D. 294; 57 L. J. Q. B. 124; 58 L. T. 403.

10. Parliamentary election—Objection—Disqualified voter.—Notice of objection to a list of voters or claimants may be given by a person who is actually on the list of persons entitled to vote, even if the judges who tried an election petition have reported him to have been guilty of corrupt practices.—Barr v. Chambers, C.A. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 264.

11. Parliamentary election—Objection—Mistake—Amendment — Reform Act, s. 32 — Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 28, sub-section 2.—By section 32 of the Reform Act no freeman of a city or borough may be registered as a Parliamentary voter "unless he shall have resided for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July (now altered to the 15th of July) in such year" within such city or borough or seven statute miles from the polling place.

A notice of objection was served upon a freeman of Norwich, stating the ground of objection in the following words:—"That you do not reside at 12, Clifton-street, Norwich." The revising barrister held that the notice was sufficient, but he allowed an amendment to be made as follows:—"That you have not resided at 12, Clifton-street, Norwich, for six calendar months next preceding the 15th of July last, and that you have not throughout that period resided within the city of Norwich or seven miles thereof."

Held, that the notice was bad, and that the revising barrister had no power to amend it, as the defect was not a "mistake" within section 18, sub-section 2, of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878. Bridges v. Miller, Q.B.D. 509—20 Q. B. D. 287; 57 L. J. Q. B. 125; 58 L. T. 405.

12. Parliamentary election—Objection—Omission—Statutory form — Registration Act, 1885, s. 18, schedule 3, Form I., No. 2.—Where notice of objection is given to a voter under the Registration Act, 1885, but the form of notice provided for the objector in the schedule of the said Act is not strictly complied with by him, the omission is a disregard of a substantive regulation, and not "an omission of any form or instruction" within section 18 which could not invalidate the notice.—Wood v. Chandler, Q.B.D. 522—20 Q. B. D. 297; 57 L. J. Q. B. 126.

13. Parliamentary election—Objection—Service—Course of post—Parliamentary Registration Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18), ss. 17, 100.—Notices of objection addressed to voters residing in barracks were posted on the 20th of August, in time to be delivered, in the ordinary course of post, at places in the borough other than the barracks on the same evening. There was no postal delivery at the barracks, but the letters were called for by orderlies. The letters were called for on the evening of the 20th of August, and were distributed, some the same evening, and others on the following day.

Held, that the notices of objection were not delivered in the "ordinary course of post," within the meaning of section 100 of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1844.—Childs v. Cox, Q.B.D. 565—20 Q. B. D. 290; 58 L. T. 338.

14. Parliamentary election—Objection—Service—Course of post—Parliamentary Voters (Ireland) Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 69), s. 113.—Notices of objection are presumed to be sent in the ordinary course of post, but the burden of proving that the notice would, in such ordinary course, arrive in time is on the objector.

The ordinary course of post includes the transit from the nearest post-office to the place of address, and extent of time ordinarily necessary must be proved by the objector.—Doogan v. Colquhoun, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 361.

15. Parliamentary election—Occupation—Dwelling-house—Lodger—Burden of proof.—A., his landlord, and a third person, each occupied a separate flat in a house rented by the landlord, all three of them using the stairs, hall door, and yard.

Held, that the burden of showing that he was an occupier and not a lodger was on A.—Campbell v. Chambers, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 355.

16. Parliamentary election—Occupation—Dwelling-house—Lodger—Representation of the People Act, 1885, s. 3.—The fact that the landlord of a house let in several tenements lives in it is a material matter to be considered in determining whether the occupiers of those tenements are qualified to vote as lodgers or as separate householders, and will, as a general rule, render the occupiers lodgers.

In order to constitute lodgings qualifying for the franchise, the part of the house occupied by the claimant must be part of one dwelling-house; and to entitle an inhabitant of part of a house to claim as an occupier, the part which he occupies must be a separate dwelling-house.—Hogan v. Sterrett, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 344.

17. Parliamentary election—Occupation—Successive occupation—Joint occupation—Severance.—A. and B., who were partners, were on the register as rated joint occupiers of premises. The partnership terminated in September of the qualifying year, and A. became the sole occupier of the premises.

Held, that it was necessary for A. to claim as occupier in succession.—Barneide v. Chambers, C.A. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 255.

18. Parliamentary election—Occupation—Successive occupation—Payment of poor rates.—The occupier in succession of different premises is not disqualified by non-payment of a poor rate levied on his former place of abode after his change of occupation.—Campbell v. Chambers (2), C.A. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 258.

19. Parliamentary election—Occupation—Temporary absence—Military service—Army Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 58) ss. 15, 176.—A non-commissioned officer on the staff of a militia regiment resided with his family in a house in a borough. During the annual training of the regiment he was absent twenty-six days of the qualifying year, but his house continued to be occupied by his wife, family, and furniture. With the leave of his superior officer he returned at intervals during the training to his house in the borough, and could have returned every night if the distance had been less.

Held, that there was not such a continuous occupation so as to confer the right to a vote.—Donoghue v. Brook, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 411; 57 L. J. Q. B. 122.

20. Parliamentary election—Occupation—Temporary absence—Reform Act, s. 31.—The claimant had the exclusive use of a separate bedroom in his father's house at Exeter, but, for the six calendar months during which residence is required by section 4? of the Reform Act, he was engaged in an occupation which would prevent him from actually residing at Exeter, except for a few days at a time.

Held, that this was not sufficient to constitute "residence" within the meaning of the section.—Beal v. Town Clerk of Exeter, Q.B.D. 587—57 L. J. Q. B. 128; 58 L. T. 407.

21. Returning officer—Costs—Taxation—Ballot Act, 1872, s. 8—Returning Officers Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 84), ss. 2, 4, 5.—By section 2 of the Returning Officers Act, 1875, the right of the returning officer to be paid for expenses reasonably incurred during a Parliamentary election is not limited to such charges only as have been vouched under sections 4 and 5. He is entitled to be indemnified for such kinds of services and expenses as are of the kinds enumerated in the schedule, and are also both reasonable and within the maximum, although such charges have been made under wrong headings and are not actually mentioned in the schedule.

If detailed particulars of items comprising charges within the description of expenses allowed as given in the schedule to the Act have been sent in to the under-sheriff and paid by him within fourteen days, and the sheriff has paid the total amount of such charges to the under-sheriff, and charged the amount to the candidates within twenty-one days, informing them where the vouchers may be inspected, the provisions of section 5 have been complied with, and the returning officer is entitled to be indemnified.—In re South-East Essex Election, Q.B.D. 44—19 Q. ESTOPPEL:—

1. Company—Share certificates—Blank transfer.—The mode of transfer of share certificates in an American railroad company was as follows:—The transfer and a power of attorney were signed by the registered shareholder. When the blank transfer reached the hand of a holder desiring to be registered, his name was filled in by himself or by someone on his behalf, and the certificate was left with the company and then cancelled, the transferee registered, and a new certificate issued in his name.

Held, that every prior holder of the certificates with blank transfers duly signed by the registered holders conferred on each subsequent bonâ fide holder for value of the certificates for the time being an authority to fill in the name of the transferee, and was estopped from denying such authority, and to that extent, but no further, was estopped from denying the title of such holder for the time being; and that an inchoate legal title in the shares passed, but that a title by unregistered transfer was not equivalent to the legal estate in the shares, nor to the complete dominion over them.—Colonial Bank v. Hepworth, CH.D. CHL, J. 259—36 Ch. D. 36; 56 L. J. Ch. 1089; 57 L. T. 148.

2. Negligence—Fraud of agent—Bank of England—Sale of stock.—The clerk to a corporation, having sole custody of their corporate seal, affixed it without their authority to a power of attorney, by means of which certain stock, the property of the corporation, was sold by the defendants, and the proceeds were appropriated by the clerk.

Held, on the authority of Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities, 5 H. L. Cas. 389, that, assuming the corporation to have been negligent, they were not disentitled to recover the stock from the defendants, since their negligence was not the proximate cause of the loss.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division affirmed.—Staple of England v. Bank of England, C.A. 880—21 Q. B. D. 160; 57 L. J. Q. B. 418.

3. Res judicata—Dismissal of action—Consent order.—A consent order dismissing an action for want of prosecution, unless it proceeds upon a compromise of the cause of action, is no bar to another action between the same parties for the same matter. The former practice of the Court of Chancery on this point is unaffected by the Rules of Court under the Judicature Act.

The plaintiffs, having made default in making discovery and answering interrogatories, told the defendants that they intended to abandon the action, and would pay their costs. The plaintiffs not having done this, the defendants issued a summons to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. The plaintiffs paid the defendants' costs, and at the hearing of the summons appeared and consented to an order dismissing the action as against the defendants. The plaintiffs having brought a fresh action against the same defendants for the same matter, the defendants raised the question of law whether the plaintiffs were not estopped by reason of the order on the summons.

Held, that the order, not having proceeded upon a compromise of the cause of action, was no bar to the fresh action.—Magnus v. National Bank of Scotland, CH.D. KAY, J. 602—58 L. T. 617.

4. Res judicata—Ecclesiastical law—Benefice—Resignation—Withdrawal—Striking out defence—Ord. 25, r. 4.—R. sent a resignation of his benefice to the bishop, on the understanding that, until a specified date, the resignation should not be formally accepted, nor the benefice declared vacant. Before the specified date R. withdrew his resignation, but the bishop refused to accept the withdrawal. He declared the benefice vacant, and a new incumbent was appointed and instituted. R. brought an action in the Chancery Division against the bishop for a declaration that his resignation was null and void, the patrons of the benefice being parties to the action, but the court held that the resignation was complete. R. remained in possession of the parsonage, and was sued by the new incumbent for trespass and an injunction to restrain him from continuing in possession. R., by his statement of defence, alleged that his resignation was not effectual.

Held, that R. was estopped by the former judgment, and that his defence must be struck out as frivolous and vexatious.—Magrath v. Reichel, Q.B.D.—57 L. T. 850.

5. Res judicata—Foreign judgment—Domicile—Legitimacy.—Although the parties claiming to be entitled to the estate of a deceased person may not be bound to resort to the tribunal of the country in which the testator was domiciled, and although the courts of this country may be called upon to administer the estate of a deceased person domiciled abroad, and in such a case may be bound to ascertain as best they can who, according to the law of the domicile, are entitled to that estate, yet, where the title has been adjudicated upon in the country to the courts of which the question is referable by the law of the domicile, such adjudication is binding, and must be followed by the courts of this country.

A foreign judgment cannot, as between the same parties, be impeached in this country on the ground that it proceeded on a mistake of law.

A foreign judgment binds, notwithstanding the discovery of fresh evidence, for the courts of this country will not either re-hear cases tried by, or hear appeals from, foreign tribunals; and, if the judgment of a foreign court is erroneous, the regular mode provided by every system of jurisprudence—of procuring it to be examined and reversed—ought to be followed.—Trafford v. Blanc, CH.D. STI., J. 162—36 Ch. D. 601; 57 L. J. Ch. 135; 57 L. T. 674.

6. Res judicata—Foreign judgment—Interlocutory judgment.—A "remate" judgment of a Spanish court, which authorises a party in whose favour a particular kind of document has been executed to commence "executive" proceedings, in which the defendant can can set up only defences which do not dispute the original right of action, and the plaintiff obtains a right to issue execution for a certain debt, with costs, the judgment not precluding either party from taking "plenary" proceedings as to the same matter, in which case the "remate" judgment cannot set off the rights of the parties, is not such a final and conclusive judgment as can be sued upon in England.

Judgment of North, J., reversed.—Nouvion v. Freeman, C.A.—37 Ch. D. 244; 57 L. J. Ch. 367.

7. Shipping—Collision—Negligence—Admission—Limitation of liability—Cargo owner—Fund in court—Proof—Ord. 52, r. 23.—A collision occurred between the defendants' ship and a ship carrying cargo belonging to the plaintiffs, and the latter vessel was sunk. The plaintiffs and the owners of the latter vessel commenced actions against the defendants, but in the shipowners' action an agreement was filed to a decree that both ships were to blame, and for a reference as to damages. The defendants then brought an action for limitation of liability, and paid money into court. Their statement of claim referred to the above-metioned agreement, and there was an express admission that the collision had been in part caused by their own improper navigation. The plaintiffs, in their defence, did not refer to the cause of the collision. A decree was made for limitation of liability, and for a stay of the plaintiffs' action.

Held, (1) that the agreement, having been filed in the registry, was, under ord. 52, r. 23, equivalent to a decree of the court; (2) that the plaintiffs were not estopped from proving against the fund for the whole of the damage sustained by them.—The Karo, P.D. & A.D.—13 P. D. 24; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 8; 58 L. T. 188.

8. Will—Legacy—Disclaimer—Company—Shares—Distringas.—A legatee of shares in a company who puts a distringas on the shares does not thereby irrevocably declare his acceptance of them, so as to be estopped from subsequently disclaiming them.—Hollis v. Wayet, CH.D. KEK., J. 73—36 Ch. D. 256; 56 L. J. Ch. 849; 57 L. T. 225.

EVIDENCE:—

1. Admission — Criminal law — Newspaper — Ireland—Meetings of proclaimed association—Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 20), ss. 5, 7.—The proprietor and publisher of a newspaper was prosecuted for unlawfully publishing a notice of the proceedings at a meeting of the Irish National League within a district where the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland had, by proclamation under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887, ordered such league to be suppressed. The defendant's newspaper had contained reports of meetings, with the heading "Branches of the National League," but there was no separate evidence as to the meetings which were held.

Held, that the passages headed as reports of meetings of the Irish National League within the proclaimed district were evidence against the defendant of the holding of the meetings, and were sufficient to sustain a conviction.—Reg. v. Sullivan, M.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 550.

2. Affidavit—Absent witness—Ord. 37, r. 1.—On the trial of a probate action the court admitted an affidavit made in the suit by a witness who was absent, although he had been served with a subpœna.—Drewitt v. Drewitt, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. T. 634.

3. Affidavit—Chief clerk—Further evidence.—On the hearing of an adjourned summons evidence filed after the time fixed by the chief clerk for the filing of evidence cannot be used unless special leave to use fresh evidence has been given either by the judge or the chief clerk.

This rule does not apply where no time has been fixed for the filing of evidence.—Chiferiel v. Watson, CH.D. NOR., J. 806.

4. Affidavit — Cross - examination — Admiralty action—Reference—Discretion of registrar—Ord. 37, r. 2.—Affidavits brought into the Admiralty Registry in support of claims filed there are, by the practice of the court, receivable in evidence, even if orders made for the cross-examination of the deponents have not been complied with; but the weight in evidence to be attached to such affidavits is for the registrar, who, in his discretion, may require the deponents to be examined in the registry or under a commission abroad, and, if no examination of the deponents takes place, may refuse to find in favour of the claim, on the ground that the evidence does not satisfy him that it is valid.—The Parisian, P.D. & A.D. 704—13 P. D. 16; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 13; 58 L. T. 92.

5. Affidavit — Cross-examination — Company — Winding up—Summons against directors—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 165.—In the absence of special circumstances, an application by a liquidator to make the directors of a company liable for misfeasance should be heard as a summons on affidavit evidence, and any cross-examination on the affidavits must be before an examiner of the court.—In re Faure Electric Accumulator Co., CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 42.

6. Affidavit — Cross-examination — Discretion of court—Motion—Ord. 38, r. 1.—The court or judge has a discretion, in making an order under ord. 38, r. 1, for the attendance for cross-examination of a person who has made an affidavit, and is not bound to make such an order.—La Trinidad v. Browne, CH.D. NOR., J. 138—37 Ch. D. 1.

7. Commission—Discretion of court—Ord. 37, r. 5.—It is in the discretion of the court or judge, taking all the circumstances of the case into account, to grant or withhold a commission to examine witnesses out of the jurisdiction, and the commission will not be granted ex debito justitiæ. The rule will be more strictly construed if the plaintiff asks for a commission to have himself examined. — Cock v. Allcock, C.A. 747—21 Q. B. D. 178; 57 L. J. Q. B. 489.

8. Commission—Examination of plaintiff—Ord. 37, r. 5.—A plaintiff desiring to be examined on commission must make out by affidavit a strong primâ facie case against his being compelled to attend the trial.—Light v. Anticosti Island Co., Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 25.

9. Competency of witness—Criminal law—Examination of prisoner—Indecent assault—Common assault—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 20.—Upon the hearing of a charge of indecent assault, the evidence of the prisoner had been received under section 20 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885.

Held, that the prisoner's evidence was admissible to support a conviction for a common assault on another count of the indictment.—Reg. v. Owen, C.C.R. 575—20 Q. B. D. 829; 57 L. J. M. C. 46; 58 L. T. 760.

10. Corroboration—Gift—Donatio mortis causâ.—A donatio mortis causâ may be established by the unsupported evidence of the donee.—Farman v. Smith, CH.D. NOR., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 637; 58 L. T. 12.

11. Criminal law—Child of tender years—Evidence not on oath—Carnal knowledge—Indecent assault—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, ss. 4, 9.—Upon the hearing of a charge under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, the evidence of a child had been received, though not given upon oath.

Held, that the evidence was admissible to support a conviction for a common assault under section 9 of the same statute. — Reg. v. Wenland, C.C.R. 576—20 Q. B. D. 827; 57 L. J. M. C. 44; 58 L. T. 781.

12. Legitimacy—Judicial separation—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19) s. 4.—There is a legal presumption that any child born more than nine months after the date of a separation order made under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, is illegitimate; and an admission made by the wife that she has had a child born more than nine months after a separation order of which the husband was not the father is admissible as evidence of her adultery.—Hetherington v. Hetherington, P.D. & A.D. 12—12 P. D. 112; 56 L. J. P. D. & A. 78; 57 L. T. 533.

13. Legitimacy—Presumption of access.—The presumption in favour of the legitimacy of a child born in wedlock may be negatived by evidence, but such evidence must be strong, distinct, satisfactory, and conclusive.—Bosville v. Attorney-General, P.D. & A.D. 79—12 P. D. 177; 56 L. J. P. D. & A. 97; 57 L. T. 88.

14. Mortgage—Covenant — Collateral agreement—Parol evidence.—In an action on a covenant in a mortgage deed for payment of principal and interest the defendant alleged that the mortgage was intended to stand as security for such sum only as should be due to the plaintiff, the parties being partners, and no accounts having been taken.

Held, that letters between the parties were admissible in evidence.—Trench v. Doran, C.P.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 339.

15. Presumption of death.—Money belonging to an intestate who had not been heard of since 1873 was in the hands of his administrator, who took out an originating summons, on which inquiries were directed. The chief clerk found that the intestate was dead in 1880, but that there was no evidence of his death before that year. He also found the set of persons who would have been the intestate's next of kin if he died in 1873, and the set of persons who would have been his next of kin if he had died in 1880. The two classes consisted of different persons.

Held, that neither class of claimants had established a title to the fund, but that the case must go back to the chief clerk for further inquiry.—Rhodes v. Rhodes, CH.D. NOR., J.—36 Ch. D. 586; 56 L. J. Ch. 825; 57 L. T. 652.

16. Will—Ambiguity—Blanks—Parol evidence.—The testator, after giving legacies to Mary Wyatt, Matthew Wyatt, Frederick Wyatt, Louisa Atwell (called Wyatt), Maria Weir, and Emily de Vere, proceeded; "I give and bequeath to , daughter of , holding some situation about the church , the sum of fifty pounds annually during the continuance of her natural life, and I direct my trustees or trustee for the time being to pay to the said the said annuity of fifty pounds, , and the receipt of the said shall be sufficient discharge to my trustees or trustee for the time being; and from the decease of the said I direct," &c. The testator directed that, "in case any one of my said legatees, Mary Wyatt, Frederick Wyatt, Matthew Wyatt, Louisa Atwell (called Wyatt), Maria Weir, Emily de Vere, or Marian Elliott," should become bankrupt, &c., her or his legacy should determine, and that the trustees or trustee should pay to her or him, "if in the case of Mary Wyatt, Matthew Wyatt, and Frederick Wyatt, the sum of forty shillings a week," and "if in the case of Maria Weir and Emily de Vere, the sum of thirty shillings a week," and "if in the case of Marian Elliott, the sum of fifteen shillings a week."

Held, on an originating summons by Marian Furniss (formerly Marian Elliott), supported by an affidavit by her to the effect that she was the daughter of James Elliott, beadle of the parish church at Epsom, and that the testator was acquainted with her, that she was entitled to the annuity of fifty pounds given by the will.—Furniss v. Phear, CH.D. NOR., J. 521.

17. Will—Secret trust—Parol evidence.—A. bequeathed to B. and M. £500 free of legacy duty, to be paid out of his pure personalty, "relying, but not by way of trust, upon their applying the said sum in or towards the object or objects privately communicated to them" by the testator.

Held, that parol evidence was admissible to show that the bequest was subject to a trust.—In re Spencer, C.A.—57 L. T. 519.

EXECUTOR:—

1. Conversion—Discretion—Delay.—An executor's discretion is not that of an absolute owner, but it is limited by the duty of bringing the assets to proper investments within a reasonable time; and the burden of proving that he has acted bonâ fide and exercised a reasonable discretion is on the executors.

The assets of a testator were subject to trusts in favour of unborn persons, and included shares of a company with unlimited liability. The executors delayed conversion after it had been demanded by the beneficiaries.

Held, that the executors were liable for the value of the shares ascertained at a reasonable date after the testator's death.—Hiddingh v. Denyssen, Denyssen v. Hiddingh, P.C.—12 App. 624; 56 L. J. P. C. 107; 57 L. T. 885.

2. Lease—Rent.—An executor who takes possession of leasehold property of his testator becomes personally liable, as assign of the lease, for payment of rent in respect of the actual value of the property from the time of taking possession. The actual value is the aggregate of what he has actually received and what with reasonable diligence he might have received, provided that such aggregate does not exceed the full amount of the rent; but he is not liable for rent beyond such value.—Earl of Strathmore v. Vane, CH.D. NOR., J. 393—37 Ch. D. 128; 57 L. J. Ch. 455.

3. Purchase of assets.—The testator had property both in England and in Jamaica. He appointed A., B., and H. as his executors, and A. and B. as his trustees. H. proved the will in Jamaica, and A. and B. proved it in England. H. purchased from A. and B. a business which had been carried on by the testator in Jamaica.

Held, that the sale must be set aside.—Harvey v. Lambert, CH.D. KEK., J.—58 L. T. 449.

4. Retainer—Priority—Debt to trust estate.—B. was executrix of her husband, whose estate was insolvent and who was indebted to the estate of A., of which he was sole trustee, in respect of the proceeds of sale of real estate.

Held, that B. was entitled to retain, in priority to all other creditors, a sum in respect of the proceeds of the sale of the real estate.—Hardwick v. Sutton, CH.D. CHL., J.—57 L. T. 14.

5. Retainer—Set-off—Deduction of debts—Married woman—Equity to settlement.—A. gave the residue of his estate to his wife for life, and then to his children equally, "for his, her, or their own absolute use and benefit."

Held, that the daughters did not take a separate estate.

A. directed his trustees to deduct any debt due to him from any of his said children from their respective shares. One of his daughters was married, without any settlement and in poor circumstances. Her husband was indebted to the testator, and the executors desired to set off the husband's debt against his wife's legacy.

Held, that the right to deduct the debt from the legacy was subject to the wife's equity to a settlement, and that part of the fund must be settled on her.

2. Lunatic asylum—Order for reception—Alteration of order—Discharge—Lunacy Regulation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 100), s. 72—Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 96), s. 4.—By section 4 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, the statement of particulars required to be given with an order for the reception of a lunatic is made part of the order, and if the order, properly understood by a reasonable mind, gives all the particulars which it is required that a medical man should have upon receiving the order, it is in accordance with the statute.

The alteration of such an order in a material particular, at all events if made with the privity of the person who relies upon it, will make it invalid, and preclude him from legally relying upon it; but it is not so where the alteration is immaterial.

A letter directing the keeper of an asylum to discharge a patient "as soon as you may think it advisable" is not an order of discharge within section 72 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1845.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (34 W. R. 144, 15 Q. B. D. 667), affirmed.—Lowe v. Fox, H.L. 25—12 App. 206; 56 L. J. Q. B. 480; 56 L. T. 404.

3. Master and servant—Tramway company—Uttering counterfeit coin—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), ss. 51, 72.—Section 52 of the Tramways Act, 1870, which enacts that "it shall be lawful for any officer or servant of the promoters or lessees of any tramway" to detain any person defrauding the company of his fare, must be construed as limited to any officer or servant appointed for that purpose.

A tramway company gave to their conductors printed instructions, in which it was ordered that, except in cases of assault, conductors were not to give passengers into custody without the authority of an inspector or timekeeper. The conductor of a car in which the plaintiff was a passenger detained the plaintiff and gave her into custody on a charge of passing bad money.

Held, in an action for false imprisonment against the company, that the defendants were not liable.—Charleston v. London Tramways Co., Q.B.D. 367.

4. Reasonable and probable cause—Pawnbrokers Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 93), s. 24.—A. offered a ring and a gold horseshoe pin set with seven diamonds as a pledge to B., a pawnbroker. B., having received from the police a list of stolen property, including a gold horseshoe pin set with seven diamonds, asked A. whether he was a dealer, and where he got the property from. A. replied that he was not a dealer, and gave the name and address of the owner. B. gave A. into custody, but it was afterwards proved that the property was not stolen, and that A.'s statements were true. A. sued B. for false imprisonment.

Held, that the question arising under section 24 of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, whether the defendant reasonably suspected the property to have been stolen or clandestinely obtained was for the judge; and that there was no evidence of an absence of reasonable suspicion, and the defendant was entitled to judgment.—Howard v. Clarke, Q.B.D—20 Q. B. D. 558; 58 L. T. 401.

FIRE INSURANCE:—

Arbitration—Condition precedent.—By a condition in a fire insurance policy it was provided that, if any difference should arise in the adjustment of a loss, the amount to be paid should be submitted to arbitration, and the party insured should not be entitled to commence or maintain any action upon the policy until the amount of the loss should have been referred and determined as therein provided, and then only for the amount so awarded.

Held, that the determination of the loss by arbitration was a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to recover in an action on the policy.—Viney v. Bignold, Q.B.D. 479—20 Q. B. D. 172; 57 L. J. Q. B. 82; 58 L. T. 26.

FISHERY:—

1. Fixed nets—Nuisance—Injunction—Fisheries (Ireland) Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 106), s. 27.—The plaintiff was owner of a several fishery in a river between the counties of S. and M., and the defendants owned a several fishery just below the plaintiff's fishery. The defendants fished by fixing a net to a wall on the S. side and stretching it across diagonally to the M. side, where their boat was anchored. The net was hauled in after being kept stationary for an hour. When the net was hauled in another boat brought another net into the same position. There was sufficient space between the bank and the anchor of the defendants' boats to enable fish to pass up the river. Until three years before the commencement of the action only one boat and net had been used, but the use of the second boat and net caused loss to the plaintiff.

Held, that stretching the net across the river was not a nuisance, but that the use of the second boat and net must be restrained by injunction.—Wilson v. Moy Fishery Co., M.R. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 270.

2. Salmon Fishery (Ireland) Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 114), s. 6—Fixed net—Certificate.—C. obtained a certificate for a flood and ebb stake net, the size and position of which were shown on a plan annexed to the certificate. He afterwards used a larger net situated more than 600 yards from the place described in the certificate.

Held, that the net was not protected by the certificate.—Doran v. Cunningham, L.J. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 544.

In a dispute between the parent lodge and the members seceding from it as to whether the proper forms had been carried out or not, the parent lodge contended before the county court judge that, so long as the registration of the lodge stood, it was not competent for the seceding members to deny that they were a branch of it. On the Registrar of Friendly Societies declining to cancel the registration, on the ground that he could not deal with the matter until the dispute had been settled by the county court, the county court judge, conceiving that he was concluded by section 11, sub-section 10, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, refused to receive evidence of secession, and gave judgment against the defendants.

Held, that it was the duty of the county court judge to receive evidence of secession.

Held, also, that the appeal was properly made by notice of motion, and not by special case.—Wilkinson v. Jagger, Q.B.D. 169—20 Q. B. D. 423; 57 L. J. Q. B. 254; 58 L. T. 487.

GAS COMPANY:—

1. Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 125), s. 6—District—Supply of gas—Point of supply—Meter.—The N. railway station lies partly in the district of the plaintiff company and partly in that of the defendant company. The defendant company placed meters within their own district, from which gas was passed through pipes to that portion of the N. Station lying within the plaintiff company's district. Section 6 of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860 (which applied to both companies), after defining the limits of each company's district, enacted that "No other company or person than the company to whom such limits are for the time being assigned . . . shall supply gas for sale within the said limits, unless authorised by Parliament so to do."

Held, that the decision in Imperial Gas Light Co. v. West London Junction Gas Co. (56 L. J. Ch. 862 note) governed the present case, and that the point of supply within the meaning of the section is the meter through which the gas passes into the pipes for consumption by the customer, and that it is not a transgression of the statutory provision to supply gas for sale at a meter within the district of the supplying company, although it is intended for consumption and is in fact consumed within the district of another company.

Per Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.—If the court was not bound by Imperial Gas Light Co. v. West London Junction Gas Co., it must have been held that "supply" of gas was a process continuing from the place where the gas is made to where it is burnt.

2. Price of gas—Reduction—Inquiry by accountant—Jurisdiction of quarter sessions—Costs—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 15), s. 35.—A petition was presented in 1885 under section 35 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847, to the Recorder of Hanley praying him to appoint a person to inquire into the actual condition of the British Gas Light Co., and an accountant was appointed. He examined into the accounts of the previous year and of all other years since 1871, and drew up a report. It was admitted that the whole of the reserve fund was not then and never had been invested, and that the prescribed maximum dividend had not been paid. The recorder held that the company's earnings had been sufficient to pay the maximum dividend and to have kept invested the whole of the reserve fund, reduced the price of gas 6d. per 1,000 cubic feet, and ordered the company to pay the expenses of the inquiry and the costs of the petitioners.

Held, on application for a certiorari to quash the order, that the order was bad, except as to the direction that the company should pay the costs of the accountant.—Reg. v. Recorder of Hanley, Q.B.D. 222—19 Q. B. D. 481; 56 L. J. M. C. 125; 57 L. T. 444.

GIFT:—

1. Chose in action—Equitable assignment—Incomplete gift.—A. held bank shares in trust for B., his father, under a written acknowledgment of the trust. B. indorsed on the acknowledgement:—"I transfer these shares to my daughter M. for her own use and benefit." B. held an I O U from A. and another I O U from E., and he indorsed on each of them:—"I transfer the debt to my daughter M. for her sole use and benefit," and handed them to M. There was no consideration for the transfer, of which no notice was given to A. or E. B. received till his death the dividends on the shares and interest on the I O U's.

Held, that the gift of the shares and debts to M. was incomplete.—Gason v. Rich, C.A. (Ir.) 19 L. R. Ir. 391.

2. Condition—Implied trust.—A. by her will, made in 1873, bequeathed a legacy of £150 to H., who was in her employment as housekeeper. In 1877 the testatrix handed to C., her solicitor (whom she had appointed one of her executors), a promissory note for £200, signed by herself, payable on demand to H., telling C. not to mention the note to anyone but H., and to retain it until the death of the testatrix, and then to give it to H. if she should remain in her service until her death. H. was informed of the note soon after it had been handed to C.

H. remained in the service of the testatrix until the latter's death, and the note remained in the possession of C.

Held, that C. was constituted a trustee of the note for H., in case she fulfilled the prescribed condition.—Shenstone v. Brock, CH.D. NOR., J. 118—36 Ch. D. 541; 56 L. J. Ch. 923; 57 L. T. 249.

3. Donatio mortis causâ—Banker—Deposit receipt—"Not transferable."—A banker's deposit receipt note, which is expressed to be "not transferable," may be the subject of a donatio mortis causâ.—Cassidy v. Belfast Banking Co. EX.D. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 68.

4. Undue influence—Religious sisterhood—Acquiescence.—The relation existing between professed nun and lady superior in a sisterhood—the rules of which require each professed member to take vows binding for life to give up all present and future property, to obey the voice of the lady superior as the voice of God, and not to seek the advice of externs without the leave of the lady superior—is a relation which of itself alone necessarily raises the presumption in equity that a voluntary gift made, during the existence of the relation, by a professed nun to the lady superior for the purposes of the sisterhood, is a gift induced by undue influence; and, in order to displace that presumption, it is not sufficient for the donee to show that the donor, before the relation existed and while acting as a free agent, had formed and expressed the intention of making the gift.

The donor in such a case has a right to claim a return of so much of the property comprised in the gift as remains in the hands of the donee at the time of making the claim; but that right may be lost by delay, after the relation has ceased, in asserting the right when coupled with acts on the part of the donor from which acquiescence in, or confirmation of, the gift may be reasonably inferred.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (35 W. R. 424, 36 Ch. D. 145), affirmed on different grounds (Cotton, L.J., dissenting).—Allcard v. Skinner, C.A. 251—36 Ch. D. 145; 56 L. J. Ch. 1052; 58 L. T. 61.

5. Undue influence—Solicitor—Voluntary gift—Delay—Death of donor.—If a person, who has made a gift to a solicitor while the relation of solicitor and client subsisted between them, is entitled at the time of his death to have the gift set aside, the personal representative of the deceased, upon his death, succeeds to the right, although the deceased had no intention of exercising it, and even expressed a determination not to do so — for he might have changed that determination the next day, and would have had a perfect right to do so.

A solicitor cannot take a gift from his client while the relation of solicitor and client subsists, and, in order to sustain such a gift, if made, something must be done, after the confidential relation has ceased, amounting to a release of the client's right to set aside the gift; but the subsequent settlement by the client of a bill of costs does not amount to such a release.

A., acting as solicitor for G. in an action, in June, 1880, recovered, by a compromise, £5,000 for her, which he received, and out of it, by her desire, retained £1,000 as a gift to himself. The relation of solicitor and client terminated shortly afterwards. In his evidence A. swore that in April, 1883, G. had told him that she had determined to adhere to what she had done. Since the severance of the relation G. had also settled a bill of costs, and had never done any act indicating an intention to recede from her gift. She died in June, 1883. Her administratrix commenced this action within six months, but died in October, 1884. In June, 1886, T. took out administration to G.'s effects, and in the following August he got an order of revivor in this action. Poverty was the excuse given for the delay.

Held, that the gift was bad at the time when it was made; that G. had never effectually released her right to set it aside, and at the time of her death was entitled to exercise that right; that on her death her personal representative succeeded to the right; that it had been kept alive by the action, notwithstanding the delay; and that the gift must consequently be now set aside.

HIGHWAY:—

1. Bridge—Repair—Indictment—Acquittal—New trial—Dedication—Liability of county—Statute of Bridges (22 Hen. 8, c. 5).—After a verdict of not guilty on an indictment for non-repair of a bridge, a new trial will not be ordered; but under special circumstances the court may order all proceedings on the judgment to be suspended, in order to give an opportunity for the question to be raised on a fresh indictment.

On the trial of an indictment against the inhabitants of a county for non-repair of a bridge built by private owners, but not built in an existing highway, the effect of the evidence as to the dedication to, and the adoption of the bridge by, the county is a question for the jury. Public user and public utility are not conclusive as to the liability of the county, but there need not be an overt act of formal adoption by a body capable of representing the county.—Reg. v. Inhabitants of Southampton, Q.B.D.—19 Q. B. D. 590; 56 L. J. M. C. 112; 57 L. T. 261.

2. Dedication—Canal—Towing-path.—A canal company has power to dedicate to the public as a highway land which has been acquired by it as a towpath under statutory powers, if the user by the public would not be incompatible with the purposes for which the land was acquired.

Rex v. Leake, 5 B. & Ad. 469, approved.—Grand Junction Canal Co. v. Petty, C.A. 795—21 Q. B. D. 273; 57 L. J. Q. B. 413.

2a. Obstruction—Footpath—Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 89), s. 28.—A., B., and C. were standing with other persons on a footpath in a town in which the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, was in force, and blocked up the path, so that many persons had to go into the road. A., B., and C. were requested by a police constable to walk on, and did so three abreast, again compelling persons to leave the path.

Held, that A., B., and C. could not be convicted for wilfully obstructing a footpath under section 78 of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847.—Reg. v. Long, Q.B.D. —59 L. T. 33.

3. Repair—Indictment—Urban sanitary authority—County authority—Highway and Locomotives Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 10.—An indictment will lie, under section 10 of the Highway and Locomotives Act, 1878, against the highway authority of a district for non-repair of a highway.

Quære, whether such indictment, being entirely of a statutable character, should not show on its face that all the steps enacted by section 10 had been previously taken.—Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Wakefield, Q.B.D. 911—20 Q. B. D. 810; 57 L. J. M. C. 52.

4. Repair—Maintenance—Paving—Contribution by county—Highway and Locomotives Act, 1878, s. 13.—The plaintiffs, having paved with stone setts a road in their highway district which was formerly a macadamised road, sought to recover from the county authority under section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, one-half of the expenses of such paving.

Held, that a different kind of road had been made, and that therefore the plaintiffs had not "maintained" the road, and could not recover against the county authority.—Leek Improvement Commissioners v. Justices of Staffordshire, C.A. 654—57 L. J. M. C. 102.

5. Repair—Municipal corporation—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 144—Indictment—Amendment.—An indictment having been preferred against a municipal corporation for non-repair of a highway within their borough, a verdict was found for the Crown. The indictment did not show on the face of it the kind of liability sought to be imposed upon the defendants, nor did it contain any statement as to the neglect alleged being "against the form of the statute."

Held, that the defendants were entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto on the ground that the indictment was bad beyond power of amendment; and that they were not indictable for non-repair under the Public Health Act of 1875.—Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Poole, Q.B.D. 239—19 Q. B. D. 602; 56 L. J. M. C. 131; 57 L. T. 485.

6. Repair—Tramway—Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, s. 13—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 28—Local Act.—By a local Tramways Act it was provided that, in case steam power should be used on the tramway, the tramway company should repair the whole extent of that part of a main road over which their lines passed, but that the company might make such contracts and agreements for the repair of the road with the road authority of the borough as might be approved by the Board of Trade. It was also provided that no contract or agreement to be entered into under the Act should operate to lessen the liability of the company under section 28 of the Tramways Act, 1870. The road authority of the borough entered into a contract with the company, by which the expenses of maintenance and repair of the road were divided between them. The borough road authority sued the county authority for contribution under section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878.

Held, that the county authority were liable to pay out of the county rate one-half of the expenses incurred by the borough authority under the contract.—Mayor, &c., of Darwen v. Justices of Lancashire, Q.B.D. 140—58 L. T. 51.

HUSBAND and WIFE:—

1. Adultery of wife—Death of husband—Negligence—Damages—Action by wife—Lord Campbell's Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), s. 2.—A woman who has left her husband and is living in adultery at the time of his death unsupported by him is not entitled to bring an action under Lord Campbell's Act for compensation for the death of her husband.

Quære, whether evidence of the willingness of the husband to take back his wife would have entitled her to claim the benefit of the Act.—Stimpson v. Wood, Q.B.D. 734—57 L. J. Q. B. 484.

2. Chose in action—Joint tenancy—Severance.—Marriage does not operate as a severance of the wife's joint tenancy in bank stock which has not been reduced into possession by the husband.

Baillie v. Treharne, 29 W. R. 729, 17 Ch. D. 388, disapproved.—Hughes v. Anderson, C.A. 817—38 Ch. D. 286; 57 L. J. Q. B. 643.

3. Deed—Acknowledgment—Chose in action—Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), ss. 77, 79, 80, 89—Common Pleas Rules, Hilary Term, 1834.—At the date of her marriage a wife was owner in fee of real estate; no settlement was executed, and the property was shortly afterwards sold by the husband and wife for £23,500, the latter acknowledging the conveyance after examination by the commissioners in the usual way. The husband received £18,000 of the purchase-money and applied it for his own purposes, and £5,500 was invested to meet an annuity, the trusts of the residue thereof being declared, by a deed of even date with the conveyance, to be in favour of the husband and wife respectively, according to their interests by law for the time being. The husband died in 1884, but the annuitant was alive, so that the £5,500 was still outstanding.

Held, that the Common Pleas rules for the examination of married women were not ultrà vires, and that the effect of the examination of the wife and her acknowledgment of the conveyance was that she thereby gave up all her interest in the property and in the purchase-money, without having any provision made for her in return; that the whole purchase-money became the absolute property of the husband; that no part of the £5,500 ever belonged to the wife, so that it never was her chose in action, and the doctrine of reduction into possession did not apply; that the declaration of trust did not alter the rights of the parties; and that the wife was not entitled to any interest in the £5,500.—Tennent v. Welch, CH.D. KAY, J. 389—37 Ch. D. 622; 57 L. J. Ch. 389; 58 L. T. 368.

4. Desertion—Separation deed—Alimony—Jurisdiction of justices—Married Women's Maintenance Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 52), s. 1.—A mere refusal by a husband to continue the payment of alimony to a wife under a separation agreement is not such a "desertion" of the wife as to give the justices jurisdiction to deal with the case under the Married Women's Maintenance Act, 1886.—Pape v. Pape, Q.B.D. 125—20 Q. B. D. 66; 57 L. J. M. C. 3; 58 L. T. 399.

5. Judgment against wife—Separate estate—Committal—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5. —Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 2.—A married woman cannot be committed to prison under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, for non-payment of a judgment debt recovered against her, payable out of her separate estate, under section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.—Scott v. Morley, C.A. 67—20 Q. B. D. 120; 57 L. J. Q. B. 43; 57 L. T. 919.

6. Judgment against wife—Separate estate—Instalments — Default — Committal.—Where a married woman had been ordered to satisfy a judgment by instalments out of her separate estate, not subject to restraint on anticipation, or liable, notwithstanding such restraint, to execution under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, but made default in the instalments, the court ordered her committal.—Johnstone v. Browne, EX.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 443.

7. Judicial separation — Desertion — Separation deed.—After a husband had deserted his wife for more than two years a separation deed was executed, but it did not contain a covenant by the wife not to sue. The husband filed a petition against the wife for dissolution, on charges which were not sustained. The wife, by her answer, prayed for a judicial separation. The husband did not, by his pleading, set up the deed as a bar to the wife's remedy, but his counsel relied on it at the trial.

Held, that the wife was entitled to a decree for judicial separation.—Moore v. Moore, Chadwick, and Griffiths, P.D. & A.D. 110—12 P. D. 193; 56 L. J. P. D. & A. 104; 57 L. T. 568.

8. Legitimacy — Foreign marriage — Uncivilised country—Polygamy.—A domiciled Englishman married, according to the native rights, a girl belonging to an uncivilised South African tribe. Polygamy was permitted by the customs of the tribe, a man being allowed one great wife and several concubines.

Held, that, although the marriage entered into was a marriage according to the customs of the tribe, it did not possess the characteristics which are essential to a contract of marriage according to English law, which is, the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others.—Bethell v. Hildyard, CH.D. STI., J. 503—38 Ch. D. 213; 57 L. J. Ch. 487; 58 L. T. 674.

9. Maintenance—Parol agreement—Consideration—County court—Jurisdiction—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.—An action for arrears of maintenance payable under a parol agreement for separation made between husband and wife, in compromise of cross-summonses for assault, was brought by the wife in a county court. The county court judge gave judgment in favour of the claim.

Held, that the agreement had been made for good consideration; that, the consideration being executed, the Statute of Frauds did not apply; and that the county court judge had jurisdiction.

10. Necessaries—Adultery of wife—Connivance of husband.—A husband who has turned his wife out of doors without any means of support on account of adultery committed by her with his connivance is liable for necessaries supplied to her.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (36 W. R. 77, 19 Q. B. D. 379) affirmed.—Wilson v. Glossop, C.A. 296—20 Q. B. D. 354; 57 L. J. Q. B. 161; 58 L. T. 707.

11. Nullity of marriage—Impotency of petitioner—Repudiation by respondent.—A husband cannot maintain a suit for nullity of marriage on the ground of his own impotency, unless his wife repudiates the marriage relation and her own obligations under the marriage contract.—A. v. B., C.A. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 403.

12. Nullity of marriage—Variation of settlement—

Reconveyance.—After a decree of nullity of marriage, the court, on a petition for variation of settlements, ordered a reconveyance of the property in the proportions in which they had respectively brought it into settlement, and freed from all the trusts of the settlement.—Leeds v. Leeds, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 373.

13. Restitution of conjugal rights — Cruelty — Separate acts.—Cruelty may consist of several separate acts, each of which need not by itself afford a ground for relief.

In a wife's suit for restitution of conjugal rights it is a good defence that the petitioner has been guilty of habitual intemperance and violence, of threatening and assaulting her husband, and of other acts tending to affect the respondent's health and social position.—Darcy v. Darcy, P. & D.D. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 369.

14. Separate estate—Contract by wife—Power of appointment. — In cases not within the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the exercise, by the will of a married woman, of a general power of appointment, whether the power be exercisable by deed or will, or by will only, does not make the property appointed liable to engagements entered into with her on the credit of her separate estate.

15. Separate estate—Fund in court—Dividends—Power of attorney—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 40—Form of order.—A married woman restrained from anticipation may appoint an attorney to receive the growing payments, but only on her behalf and for her use.

16. Separate estate—Gift to husband and wife and third person—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 1, 5.—The rule that, under a gift by will to a husband and wife and a third person, the husband and wife take only one moiety between them, the third person taking the other moiety, is not affected by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and is still applicable to a gift under a will made since that Act came into operation. The effect of the Act is that the husband and wife each take one-fourth, the wife's share being her separate property.

Mander v. Harris, 31 W. R. 885, 24 Ch. D. 222, disapproved.—Jupp v. Buckwell, CH.D. KAY, J. 712; 57 L. J. Ch. 774.

17. Separate estate—Judicial separation—Question as to property—Inquiry by registrar — Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17.—A wife, who had obtained a decree for a judicial separation, claimed certain furniture as her separate property, but her husband denied that she had a title to it. The court made an order, under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, directing the registrar to inquire whether the furniture formed part of the wife's separate estate.—Phillips v. Phillips, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. J. P. D. & A. 76.

18. Separate estate—Judgment against wife—Antenuptial debt—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 14, 15, 19.—In an application to sign final judgment against a married woman for a debt contracted before marriage it is not necessary to prove that she possesses separate estate.

Such a judgment should be in the form settled by the Court of Appeal in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120.—Downe v. Fletcher, Q.B.D. 694.

19. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation.—Where a fund has, subject to a trust for accumulation for a particular period, been bequeathed to a married woman for her separate use absolutely with a restraint on anticipation, that restraint will be construed as referable only to the antecedent period when, and only when, the testator has shown an intention inconsistent with the confinement of the restraint to that period.

O'Halloran v. King, 33 W. R. 58, 27 Ch. D. 411, distinguished.

Decision of Kay, J., affirmed.—In re Tippett and Newbould, C.A. 597—37 Ch. D. 444; 58 L. T. 754.

20. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Contract during coverture—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 1, 5. 19.—By a settlement before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, real estate devised to a married woman for her separate use was settled for her separate use without power of anticipation for life, then to her husband for life, then to the children of the marriage, there being none at the date of the settlement. After the Act and during coverture the wife made a promissory note in favour of the plaintiffs, who, after the death of the husband, obtained judgment on the note.

Held, that the settled estate was not liable to satisfy the judgment.—Beckett v. Tasker, Q.B.D. 158—19 Q. B. D. 7; 56 L. T. 636.

21. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Judgment against wife—Payment by instalments—Debtors (Ireland) Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 57), s. 6—An order under the Debtors Act, 1872, for payment by instalments of a debt due under a judgment against a married woman having separate estate subject to restraint on anticipation, even if the defendant has received income from the separate estate since the judgment.—Morgan v. Eyre, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 541.

22. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Judicial separation—Property acquired before decree—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 25.—Under section 25 of the Divorce Act, 1857, a wife who has obtained a decree for judicial separation is to be considered as a feme sole with respect only to property which she may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her after the separation decree; and the section does not apply to property to which the wife at the date of the separation decree was entitled in possession.

Cooke v. Fuller, 26 Beav. 99, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 25, questioned.

Decision of Kay, J., affirmed.—Waite v. Morland, C.A. 484—38 Ch. D. 135; 57 L. J. Ch. 655.

23. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Sale of real estate—Title.—A. gave and bequeathed all his freehold and leasehold estate to his two daughters, as tenants in common, to and for their respective sole and separate use and benefit absolutely, and he expressed his wish and request that they should not sell or dispose of any part of the premises. The two daughters, one of whom was married, contracted to sell part of the freehold property.

Held, that the married daughter could not make a good title.—In re Hutchings and Burt, CH.D. KAY, J. —58 L. T. 6.

24. Separate estate—Sequestration—Divorce—Custody of children—Divorce Act, 1857, ss. 35, 52—Ord. 42, r. 33; ord. 43, r. 6; ord. 68, r. 1.—It is the proper practice now, as it was in the Divorce Court formerly, to issue writs of sequestration in general form against "the estate and effects" of a married woman, without any express limitation in the writ to property of the married woman not subject to a restraint on anticipation; but nevertheless the writ can only operate on property of the married woman not subject to a restraint on anticipation.

Ellis v. Johnson, 34 W. R. 309, 31 Ch. D. 532, followed.

Miller v. Miller, 18 W. R. 585, L. R. 2 P. & D. 55, explained.

Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120, distinguished.

In a suit for dissolution of marriage, an order was made on the wife to deliver up the children to the custody of the husband, and not to withdraw them from the jurisdiction of the court. The wife, who at the date of the order had been residing with her sister and brother-in-law, evaded service of the order and did not comply with it. Butt, J., on the application of the husband, made an order directing the wife's sister and the brother-in-law to attend before the court for the purpose of being examined as to their knowledge of the whereabouts of the wife and children.

Held, that a judge of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division had no jurisdiction to make such an order.—Hyde v. Hyde and Felgate, C.A. 708—57 L. J. P. D. & A. 89.

25. Separate estate—Settlement—Second marriage—Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, ss. 2, 19.—Under a marriage settlement property was vested in trustees upon trust, in events which had happened, for such persons as the wife, the husband being dead, should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, for her absolutely. The power was not exercised during the widowhood. In 1887 the wife remarried.

Held, that, prior to the second marriage, the wife would have been entitled to have the fund paid to her absolutely; that the effect of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was to add the incident of separate use to whatever interest she had in the property comprised in the settlement; and that she and her husband were entitled to have the fund paid to them discharged from the settlement.—Plowden v. Gayford, CH.D. STI., J. 583.

26. Separation deed — Covenant — Molestation — Alimony.—By a separation deed the husband covenanted to make an allowance to the wife, determinable upon her molesting him. The husband subsequently discontinued the allowance, on the ground that the wife had broken her covenant not to molest him. The wife afterwards instituted a suit for judicial separation, and applied for an allowance of alimony pendente lite.

Held, that the wife was entitled to the allowance.—Wood v. Wood, C.A. 33—57 L. J. Ch. 1; 57 L. T. 746.

2. Deduction—Bank—Residence of manager—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s 100, schedule D.—A banking company carried on business on premises of which a part was occupied as the residence of the manager of the bank.

Held, that the annual value of the portion of the premises occupied by the manager should be deducted from the annual value of the whole premises in calculating the profits of the bank under Schedule D. to the Income Tax Act, 1842.—Russell v. Town and County Bank, H.L.—13 App. 418.

In 1880 he expended a large sum in making an embankment, whereby he excluded the tidal river altogether, and the land became valuable property, yielding a large income.

Held, that the making of the embankment was not necessary for the preservation or protection of the land against the encroachment or overflowing of the tidal river within the exception of section 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, and that no allowance or deduction could be allowed for the amount expended by the landlord in making the embankment, since the embankment was made to increase the capital value of the land by altering its condition, and not to protect it.—Hesketh v. Bray, Q.B.D. 622—20 Q. 4. Deduction—Tithes—Cost of collection—Income Tax Act, 1853, ss. 5, 32.—A tithe owner is entitled to deduct from his income tax assessment in respect of a vicarial commutation tithe rent-charge the amount which he is compelled to pay in collecting his tithes.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 35 W. R. 839, 19 Q. B. D. 442) affirmed.—Stevens v. Bishop, C.A. 421—20 Q. B. D. 442; 57 L. J. Q. B. 283; 58 L. T. 669.

5. Diminution of profits—Repayment—Maximum—Income Tax Act, 1842, s. 133.—By section 133 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, "If, within or at the end of the year current at the time of making any assessment under this Act, . . . any person . . . shall find and shall prove to the satisfaction of the commissioners by whom the assessment was made that his profits and gains during such year for which the computation was made fell short of the sum so computed, . . . it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, . . . in case the sum assessed shall have been paid, to certify under their hands to the commissioners for special purposes the amount of the sum overpaid, . . . and thereupon the last-named commissioners shall issue an order for the repayment of such sum as shall have been so overpaid."

In March, 1887, the appellants made a claim for repayment of income tax assessed on profits for the years ending April, 1884, and April, 1885. The general commissioners, after inquiry, granted their certificate. The special commissioners having refused to issue an order for the repayment of the sum, application was made for a mandamus to compel them to do so.

Held, that a mandamus would lie, and that the meaning of the section was that the over-assessment should be found and proved as soon after the end of the year as, by using all reasonable and proper exertions, the applicant could ascertain it.

Per Lord Esher, M.R.—The general commissioners are the final judges as to whether the application has been made in time or not, and their certificate is binding on the special commissioners, who have no power to question their decision.

Per Lindley, L.J.—When a certificate has been granted by the general commissioners, the onus of proving that the application was not made in time is thrown on the Crown, and the mere production of the dates of the application and of the years for which the certificate has been granted is not sufficient ground for disregarding the certificate.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 36 W. R. 671, 20 Q. B. D. 549) reversed.—Reg. v. Commissioners of Income Tax, C.A. 776—21 Q. B. D. 313.

5a. Exemption — Charitable institution — Mutual benefit society—Subscriptions — Donations—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 51), s. 11.—The Linen and Woollen Drapers' Institution was founded to make provision for sick and aged persons in those trades and their widows and children. Any person of three years' experience in such trades, and living within twelve miles of the General Post Office, was to be eligible as a member. Pecuniary and other relief was to be given to members or their families, who might receive either a lump sum, a temporary allowance, or a life annuity. Members were to be entitled to free medical attendance, and all relief to members was to be granted at the discretion of the directors, and relief was only to be given to persons in necessitous circumstances. The property of the institution consisted of accumulated subscriptions and donations from persons not being members.

Held, that the institution was not a charitable institution within section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, but was in the nature of a mutual benefit society, and that the accumulated subscriptions were not exempt from income tax, but that the proceeds of donations were exempt.—In re Linen and Woollen Drapers' Institution, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 949.

6. Foreign business—Agents in England—Income Tax Act, 1842, ss. 41, 44—Income Tax Act, 1853, s. 2, schedule D.—The appellants, who were wine merchants domiciled and resident at Rheims, in France, employed a London firm of wine merchants as their sole agents in the United Kingdom for the sale of their wine, the agents being paid a commission, upon which they paid income tax, on all wines sold by the appellants in the United Kingdom, and paying all expenses. The agents' office was taken in their own name and on their own sole account, and they carried on their own business there. The appellants' name was inserted in the list of wine merchant in the "London Directory." Price lists and circulars were from time to time issued by the agents to wine merchants, with the authority of the appellants, giving the price of the wine and the terms of sale. Orders for wine were transmitted by the agents to the appellants at Rheims, and the appellants forwarded the wine direct to the customers and the goods were invoiced in the appellants' name as vendors, the contracts for the wine being made by the agents in England. The terms of sale were that the wine was sold as it was stored in the cellars at Rheims the cost of packing and carriage being paid by the purchaser, and the wine being at his risk from the time it left the cellars. The appellants kept no wine in England, and had no banking account there. The purchasers either paid the agents, who remitted the amount to the appellants, or paid the appellants direct, and the appellants sent receipts to the purchasers for all payments.

Held, that a trade was exercised within the United Kingdom within the second clause of schedule D. to section 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, and that the appellants were assessable to the income tax upon the annual profits or gains arising therefrom.

Held, also, that section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, did not limit the language of schedule D., but was intended to aid the commissioners in recovering the tax.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division affirmed.—Werle v. Colquhoun, C.A. 613—20 Q. B. D. 753; 57 L. J. Q. B. 323; 58 L. T. 756.

7. Foreign business—Partnership—Profits remitted to England—Income Tax Act, 1853, s. 2, schedule D.—A partner in a firm carrying on business solely at Melbourne resided wholly in England. A portion of his share in the profits of the Melbourne business was transmitted to him in England and duly returned by him for assessment to income tax. The remainder of his share was left in Australia, and stood to his credit on the books of the firm. He was assessed to income tax on the whole amount of his share of the profits.

Held (Fry, L.J., dissenting) that he was only liable to be assessed to income tax in respect of that portion of his share of the profits of the Melbourne business transmitted to and received by him in this country.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 36 W. R. 332, 19 Q. B. D. 400) reversed.—Colquhoun v. Brooks, C.A. 657—21 Q. B. D. 52; 57 L. J. Q. B. 439.

8. Profits—Municipal corporation—Water rates—Supply outside borough.—By a private Act the corporation of D. had power to construct waterworks for the borough and for certain extra-municipal districts, and, for the purposes of the Act, to borrow money on security of the rates, and to levy water rates on owners and occupiers within the borough, and to contract with owners and occupiers in extra-municipal districts for the supply of water. By a later Act the income from the supply of the extra-municipal districts was to form a consolidated fund, available for paying loans and interest and for all the purposes of the Act.

Held, that the excess of income over expenditure in respect of the extra-municipal districts was chargeable with income tax.—Mayor, &c., of Dublin v. McAdam, M.R. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 497.

INDICTMENT.—See CRIMINAL LAW, 1; HIGHWAY, 1, 3, 5.

INFANT:—

1. Contract—Domicile—Scotch law.—The widow of a domiciled Scotchman sued to set aside an antenuptial contract whereby, in consideration of a provision made by her husband, she had renounced all rights to which she would become entitled as his widow. The contract had been executed in Ireland, the wife having been then an infant with an Irish domicile, but it was then contemplated that the husband and wife should live in Scotland, and they did so throughout their married life.

Held, (1) that the House of Lords could take judicial notice of the law of Ireland; (2) that the wife's capacity to bind herself by the contract must be determined by the law of her domicile, and therefore she could avoid the contract.—Cooper v. Cooper, H.L.—13 App. 88; 59 L. T. 1.

2. Contract—Ratification—Promise of marriage—New promise—Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62), s. 2.—The defendant, while he was under age, promised to marry the plaintiff. After he came of age the plaintiff told him that her father's pecuniary circumstances were altered, and offered to release him from his engagement. The defendant was much hurt at this, and said that he was ready to marry her then if she thought they were old enough. The plaintiff replied that she thought they had better wait till they were older. Subsequently the defendant refused to carry out the engagement.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, 36 W. R. 693), that there was evidence on which the jury might find that there had been a new promise by the defendant after he came of age.—Holmes v. Brierley, C.A. 795—59 L. T. 70.

3. Custody—Misconduct of father—Jurisdiction—Infants Guardianship Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 27), s. 5.—A mother applied for the custody of her son, aged ten years, on the ground of the misconduct of the father.

Held, that, under section 5 of the Infants Guardianship Act, 1886, the court had jurisdiction to make such order as it might think fit regarding the custody, and the right of access of either parent, having regard to the welfare of the infant, the conduct of the parents, and the wishes of the mother and the father, and to order the delivery of the infant to the custody of its mother without fixing any limit of age.—In re Witten, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 336.

4. Custody—Religious education—Separation deed—Infants Custody Act, 1873, s. 2.—The words "custody or control" in section 2 of the Infants Custody Act, 1873, comprise all the rights which a father has over his children, including that of directing their religious education.

A motion was made by the mother of a female infant, eight years of age, for the exclusive control of the education of the infant, and that the father's access might be limited. The father, a Roman Catholic, was married to the mother, a Protestant, in 1878. In 1881 a separation deed was executed, containing a declaration that the wife should have the absolute custody and control of the infant until the deed should be put an end to by the parties, without interference by the husband. The father had not seen the child for three years and a half, and no reason for his not doing so was alleged. An order was made in an action to administer the trusts of the separation deed, the mother undertaking not to bring up the child in any manner at variance with the Roman Catholic faith. The father was without means to maintain the child.

Held, that it was for the benefit of the infant to give effect to the agreement in the separation deed, and that it should be enforced.—Condon v. Vollum, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 154.

5. Guardian—Absence of parents—Infants Guardianship Act, 1886, ss. 2, 6.—Where the mother of two infants, whose father had died intestate, was residing permanently out of the jurisdiction, the court, with the mother's consent, made an order substituting the infants' paternal uncle as guardian.—In re Lemons, L.C. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 575.

6. Guardian—Religious education—Rights of mother—Infants Guardianship Act, 1886, ss. 2—5.—The right of a father to decide what religious education his children shall receive has not been affected by the passing of the Infants Guardianship Act, 1886, under which a mother, as guardian of an infant, has no greater powers, in deciding upon its religious education, than were possessed, at the passing of the Act, by any guardian appointed by will or otherwise under 12 Car. 2, c. 24.—In re Scanlan, CH.D. STL., J. 841; 57 L. J. Ch. 718.

7. Maintenance—Accumulation—Consols—Dividends—Payment to trustees—1 Will. 4, c. 65, s. 31.—A sum of Consols was standing in the sole name of an infant, and it was desired to obtain payment of the dividends to be accumulated for her benefit, as they were not required for her maintenance. The Bank of England refused to act upon a suggested order requiring them to accumulate the dividends.

The court made an order for payment of the dividends to the trustees of a will under which the property was derived, to be applied for the benefit of the infant.—In re Kemp, CH.D. KAY, J. 729.

8. Maintenance—Payment out of court—Petition—Summons—Ord. 55, r. 2.—The mere fact that a fund in court exceeds £1,000 is not of itself sufficient to justify the presentation of a petition for payment out if the title to the fund depends only upon proof of the identity, or of the birth, marriage, or death of any person.—Bates v. Moore, CH.D. NOR., J. 586—38 Ch. D. 381; 58 L. T. 513.

9. Ward of court—Settlement—Costs—Payment out of corpus.—The costs of a settlement of the property of a female ward of court, made upon her marriage with the sanction of the court, were ordered to be paid out of the corpus of the settled property.

Anonymous case, 4 Russ. 473, followed.—De Sinepoole v. Seymour, CH.D. NOR., J. 320—37 Ch. D. 139; 57 L. J. Ch. 463; 58 L. T. 382.

10. Ward of court—Settlement—Reversionary interest—Divorce—Infants' Settlement Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 43), s. 1.—An infant ward of court, having married without the sanction of the court, afterwards executed a post-nuptial settlement with the approval of the Vice-Chancellor, whereby she settled a reversionary interest in personalty, to which she was entitled under a will made in 1838, upon trust for herself for life with remainder to her children. A dissolution of the marriage was decreed on the wife's petition, but during coverture she had recognised the settlement in various ways. The reversionary interest fell into possession after the dissolution of the marriage.

Held, that neither the sanction of the court nor the Infants' Settlement Act, 1855, could make the post-nuptial settlement of the wife's reversionary interest in personalty binding upon her; that no acts of acquiescence during coverture—and, after the dissolution of the marriage, nothing except the actual disposition by her of the property to the trustees of the settlement—could have that effect, and that she was entitled to a transfer of the property to herself.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 438, 35 Ch. D. 21) affirmed.—Seaton v. Seaton, H.L. 865—13 App. 61; 57 L. J. Ch. 661; 58 L. T. 565.

INJUNCTION:—

1. Bond—Condition—Penalty—Liquidated damages.—The condition of a bond, though the bond contains recitals, may, having regard to surrounding circumstances and the intention of the parties, be evidence of an agreement sufficient to sustain an injunction.—London and Yorkshire Banking Co. v. Pritt, CH.D. CHI., J. 135—57 L. T. 875.

2. Company—Director—Exclusion by co-directors.—An injunction will be granted in an action by a director of a company against his co-directors to restrain them from excluding him from acting as director, although, in the opinion of the directors, he is unfit to be a director of the company by reason of alleged misconduct.—Kyshe v. Alturas Gold Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 496.

3. Company—Inspection of register—Mandamus—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 16), ss. 45, 63.—A company is bound, under sections 45 and 63 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to allow a holder of stock and debentures to inspect the whole of its register, and has no right to require him to state his reasons for inspection. The proper remedy in case of a refusal to allow inspection is an injunction, not a mandamus.

Rex v. Wilts and Berks Canal Co., 3 A. & E. 477, explained.—Holland v. Dixon, CH.D. CHI., J. 320— 37 Ch. D. 669; 57 L. J. Ch. 502; 58 L. T. 845.

4. Company — Shares — Registration — Priority—Equitable title—Inchoate legal title.—The plaintiff, a married woman living apart from her husband, purchased, out of money belonging to her for her separate use, 175 shares in the W. L. A. Co., which were transferred to, and registered in the name of, the defendant W., who held as trustee for the plaintiff for her separate use. In February, 1886, W. executed a transfer of seventy-five of the plaintiff's shares to the defendants H. and A., leaving blanks for the date and the consideration, which he sent to them, together with the certificates of the shares as a security for a debt due from his firm. On the 5th of May the defendants H. and A. filled in the blank for the consideration with five shillings, and that for date with the 4th of May; and, on the 6th of May, the transfer, together with the certificates, was sent to the company for registration. Immediately on the receipt of the transfer the manager of the company wrote to the plaintiff informing her of the facts, who thereupon instituted the present action to restrain the defendants H. and A. from dealing with the shares. The deed of settlement by which the company was constituted provided that no person claiming to be the proprietor of any share by transfer should be entitled to be treated or recognised as such unless and until he should have been registered in the register of shareholders as the proprietor of the shares; that no person should be entitled to be registered in the register of shareholders as the proprietor of any share unless and until he should, by the execution of settlement or some deed referring thereto, have undertaken all the liabilities, duties, and obligations of a shareholder in respect of such share; and that it should be essential to the legal validity of a transfer that the deed by which it was effected should be deposited or left at the office of the company.

Held, that the defendants H. and A. had not shown a legal title in themselves, or, as between themselves and the company, an absolute and unconditional right to be registered as shareholders in the place of the defendant W., but that their title was inchoate only, and insufficient to defeat the prior equitable title of the plaintiff.

5. Company—Winding up—Assets in Scotland—Attachment in Scotland—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 87.—An order was made to wind up a company which had assets in Scotland. The liquidator's solicitors employed R., a Scotch solicitor, as their agent in Scotland. Property of the company in Scotland having been sold, R. took proceedings to attach the proceeds in the hands of the auctioneer. R. had agreed to look only to the assets of the company for his remuneration.

The court granted an injunction to stay R.'s proceedings in Scotland.—In re Hermann Loog, CH.D. NOR., J.—57 L. T. 47.

6. Husband and wife—Judicial separation.—After a decree of judicial separation at the suit of a wife, the court granted an interim injunction restraining the respondent from dealing with certain portions of his property. The parties were afterwards reconciled.

The court refused to continue the injunction or to appoint a receiver.—Hawes v. Hawes, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 374.

7. Libel—Interlocutory injunction.—An interlocutory injunction to restrain the future publication of matters defamatory of an indefinite general description ought not to be granted, because, if the injunction was granted, it would be left to the court to decide, on motion to commit, whether what might thereafter be published was libellous or not.

The principles laid down in Coulson v. Coulson, 3 Times L. R. 846, as to granting interlocutory injunctions with respect to libels, approved.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.—Liverpool Household Stores Association v. Smith, C.A. 485—37 Ch. D. 170; 57 L. J. Ch. 285; 58 L. T. 204.

8. Marine insurance — Unseaworthiness.—Underwriters sued for an injunction to restrain policyholders from taking any proceedings with reference to a policy of insurance, on the ground that the underwriters had an admittedly good defence to any action that might be brought on such policy.

Held, that an injunction ought not to be granted.—Brooking v. Maudslay, CH.D., STI., J. 664—38 Ch. D. 636; 58 L. T. 852.

9. Partnership—Assistant—Dissolution—Restraint of trade—Joint and separate contract.—A. was engaged as assistant to B. and C., who carried on business as surgeons in partnership at N. Upon entering their service, A. gave to B. and C. a bond, which contained the recital of an agreement that A. would not at any time thereafter "set up or carry on the business or profession of a surgeon." The partnership between B. and C. was subsequently dissolved, and A. was engaged by B. as his assistant. C. applied to restrain A. from so acting.

Held, that the agreement entered into by A. with B. and C. was both joint and several, and that C. was entitled to sue alone for a breach of it.

Held, also, that A. had committed a breach of it by acting as assistant to B., and that an injunction ought, therefore, to be granted.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.—Palmer v. Mallet, C.A. 460—36 Ch. D. 411.

10. Trade-mark—Fraudulent imitation—Account.—Where an injunction has been obtained by a plaintiff restraining a defendant from selling his goods in a form so resembling the plaintiff's as to lead purchasers to believe that they were the goods of the plaintiff, the order for an account should direct an account of all profits made by the defendant in selling his goods in that particular form, and should not be limited by excluding therefrom the profits on those of the goods which the defendant can prove were sold as his.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.—Lever v. Goodwin, C.A. 176—36 Ch. D. 1; 57 L. T. 583.

11. Trade name—Infringement—Newspaper.—The plaintiff was the proprietor of the Morning Post. The defendants had recently commenced publishing an evening newspaper under the name of the "Evening Post, with which is incorporated the Daily Recorder." The printing of the name and the general typography of the paper resembled that of the Morning Post, and the shape was the same, but the size and number of columns of letterpress were different. The plaintiff did not publish an evening edition of his paper, nor was it alleged that he intended to do so. It was proved that twenty persons had applied at the office of the Morning Post for copies of the Evening Post, under the impression that there was some connection between the two papers.

Held, that no injunction could be granted, as no damage to the plaintiff had been proved.

Decision of Kay, J., reversed.—Borthwick v. Evening Post Co., C.A. 435—37 Ch. D. 449; 57 L. J. Ch. 406; 58 L. T. 252.

12. Trade name—Infringement—Newspaper—Copyright—Registration.—No copyright in the title of a newspaper is acquired by registration of the paper under the Copyright Acts.

An exclusive right to the use of the title of a paper may, however, be acquired at common law by reputation and acceptance, and the existence or non-existence of such reputation and acceptance is a matter of fact to be decided on the evidence.—Licensed Victuallers' Newspaper Co. v. Bingham, C.A. 433—38 Ch. D. 139.

13. Trade name—Infringement—Newspaper—Fraudulent imitation.—The plaintiff was proprietor of the Grocer newspaper, published in London, which had a supplement called the Oil Trade Review. Both publications were duly registered at Stationers' Hall, and in 1886 they were amalgamated as the Grocer and Oil Trade Review. In 1888 the defendant began to publish, in Dublin, a publication called the Grocer and Wine Merchant and Irish Brewer and Distiller, which was not intended to represent the same branch of the trade as the plaintiff's newspaper.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from using the word "Grocer" as the first or principal part of the title of his newspaper.—Reed v. O'Meara, V.C. (IR.)—21 L. R. Ir. 216.

JURISDICTION:—

1. Administration—Originating summons—Will—Ord. 55, rr. 3, 5.—The court has no jurisdiction, under ord. 55, r. 3, to decide, on an originating summons as between a legal devisee and another person, any question which would not have arisen in the administration of the testator's estate or the trusts of his will.—Davies v. Davies (3), CH.D. 2. Charitable trust—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), s. 28.—The freemen of the city of N. had, at the trial of an action against the corporation of that town, obtained a declaration that the corporation was seised of the Town Close in trust for the freemen; but the judge, though declining to order a scheme to be settled, prefaced the order made at the trial of the action with a declaration that it was "without prejudice to any other proceedings that might be taken by the Attorney-General." A summons was taken out by the Attorney-General under section 48 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, for a scheme to be settled.

Held, that the Act only applied where a charitable trust existed, and gave no jurisdiction to decide on summons whether this was so or not.—In re Norwich Town Close Estate, CH.D. KEK., J. 853.

CHL., J. 347—39 L. T. 178.

4. County court—Bankruptcy—Administration order—Money in hands of third party—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 125.—Where an order for the administration of a deceased debtor's estate is made under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the court, in administering, will follow the practice of the Chancery Division of the High Court, and no power is given to the county court in bankruptcy which the High Court does not possess in administration actions to direct a stranger to pay over money.—Ex parte Ellis, In re Crowther, Q.B.D., BAKER, 189—20 Q. B. D. 38; 57 L. J. Q. B. 57; 58 L. T. 115.

4a. County court—Bankruptcy—Committal order—Receiving order—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 103.—A county court judge having bankruptcy jurisdiction has power to make a receiving order instead of a committal order, even if it has not been proved that the debtor has had means of payment.—Reg. v. Judge of Sussex County Court, Q.B.D.—59 L. T. 32.

5. Divorce—Domicile—Naturalisation of father.—The petitioner in a suit for dissolution of marriage was born in France of French parents. When he was ten years old his parents came to England, and his father was afterwards naturalised as a British subject. When he was eighteen years old the petitioner went to Canada, where he bought a farm, served in the Colonial volunteers, and voted at elections. In 1878 he married the respondent, who was a Canadian, and in 1883 he brought the respondent and their children to England, where they resided with his father. The petitioner went back several times to Canada, and since 1884 he had been for only seven months in England. The adultery was alleged to have been committed in England.

Held, that the petitioner's domicile was English, and that the court had jurisdiction in the suit.—D'Etchegoyen v. D'Etchegoyen and D'Etchegoyen, P.D. & A.D.—13 P. D. 132.

6. Husband and wife—Nullity of marriage—Foreign judgment — Domicile. — A British subject domiciled in England was married in England to an American citizen. The parties went to the United States with the intention of making their permanent home there. The wife obtained a decree in the United States dissolving the marriage, on the ground of her husband's impotency. After the dissolution she came to live in England and filed a petition to have the marriage declared null and void.

Held, that the American court had jurisdiction; that by its decree the marriage was absolutely dissolved; and that no marriage existed upon which the court could pronounce any decision.—Turner (otherwise Thompson) v. Thompson, P.D. & A.D. 702—13 P. D. 36; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 40; 58 L. T. 387.

7. Infant—Guardian—Foreign parent—Domicile—Naturalisation Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 14), s. 7.—In 1871 B., a French subject who had resided in England for ten years, obtained a certificate setting forth that he was thereby naturalised as a British subject, and that he would, upon taking the oath of allegiance, be entitled to all the rights and privileges, and subject to all the obligations, of a natural-born British subject, with a condition that he should not, while within the State of which he was previously a subject, be deemed to be a British subject unless he had ceased to be a subject of such State by the law of such State. In 1870 B. had married an Englishwoman, and his two children were born in France. In 1886 B. died in France, having executed a will in the French form. In 1887 his widow died, and her half-brother applied to the court to be appointed guardian of the children.

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction.—In re Bourgoise, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 431.

8. Judgment summons—Commitment—Instalments—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5.—Judgment was recovered in a county court against a defendant, who was ordered to pay £20 in a fortnight. Upon default in payment, a judgment summons was taken out and an order was made to commit the defendant to prison for ten days. The judge directed that the warrant should not issue if the defendant paid instalments of £4 a month.

Held, that the order was made in respect of the past default in payment of £20, and not in anticipation of a default in payment of £4, and that the judge had jurisdiction to make the order under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 130, 18 Q. B. D. 213) reversed.—Stonor v. Fowle, H.L. 742—13 App. 20; 57 L. J. Q. B. 587; 58 L. T. 1.

9. Lunacy—Maintenance—Fund in court.—Where the share in a fund to which a person of unsound mind had become absolutely entitled was paid into court in the Chancery Division by the trustees of the fund, the court, upon the application of such person by his next friend, without requiring the appointment in Lunacy of a guardian, directed the entire income to be paid to the wife of such person during his life, or until further order, for his maintenance, comfort, and support.—In re Silva's Trusts, CH.D. CHI., J. 366—57 L. J. Ch. 281; 58 L. T. 46.

10. Lunacy—Receiver—Pending inquisition.—The court has power, on an ex parte application, to appoint an interim receiver, pending an application for an inquisition in Lunacy.—In re Pountain, LUN.—37 Ch. D. 609; 57 L. J. Ch. 465; 59 L. T. 76.

11. Lunacy—Trustee Acts—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 51.—The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal in lunacy matters is not limited to petitions entitled "In Lunacy and in the matter of the Trustee Acts," but extends to all applications in Lunacy which require an exercise of the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division.—In re Platt, LUN. 273—36 Ch. D. 410; 57 L. J. Ch. 152; 57 L. T. 857.

12. Mayor's Court—Account stated—Prohibition—Estoppel.—The plaintiff's solicitor, who carried on business within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court of London, wrote to the defendant demanding payment of £7 6s. 6d. for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. Neither of the parties resided or carried on business, nor was the contract entered into, within the jurisdiction. The defendant, in a letter written to the plaintiff's solicitor—posted outside, but received within, the jurisdiction—admitted that he owed £5 6s. 6d. to the plaintiff. The plaintiff having brought an action in the Mayor's Court to recover £7 6s. 6d. for goods sold and delivered, the defendant obtained a writ of prohibition staying proceedings therein. The plaintiff brought a second action to recover £5 6s. 6d. on an account stated, and the defendant obtained a second writ of prohibition.

Held, that the prohibition in the first action was not an estoppel against the bringing of the second action; that the admission of the defendant and the bringing of the second action amounted to an account stated; that the account was stated within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court; that the plaintiff's solicitor was his agent to receive the admission and to state the account; and that the Mayor's Court had jurisdiction to try the action.—Grundy v. Townsend, C.A. 531.

13. Mayor's Court—Carrying on business—Clerk to solicitor—Mayor's Court Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. clvii.), s. 12.—A clerk employed by a solicitor whose office is in the City of London does not "carry on business within the City of London" within the meaning of the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857, s. 12.—Lewis v. Graham, Q.B.D. 574—20 Q. 15. Order in chambers — Motion to discharge — Judicature Act, 1873, s. 50.—The court has no power to alter the order of a judge in chambers, except on motion to discharge it. — Attorney-General v. Llewellyn, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 367.

16. Solicitor—Costs—Delivery of bill—Non-contentious business—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37—Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 16, 34, sub-section 2—Judicature Act, 1884 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 68), ss. 2, 24.—By section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, power was conferred on the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls to order delivery of a solicitor's bill of costs where no part of the business contained in such bill had been transacted in any court.

Held (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that the effect of the Judicature Acts was to transfer the power to the High Court, and that it might be exercised by any judge of that court, but that since, by section 34, sub-section 2, of the Judicature Act, 1873, matters under an Act of Parliament, by which exclusive jurisdiction in respect of such matters had been given to the Court of Chancery, were assigned to the Chancery Division, the application was irregular.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division reversed. —In re Pollard, C.A. 515—20 Q. B. D. 656; 57 L. J. Q. B. 273.

17. Stay of proceedings—Frivolous and vexatious action—Ord. 25, r. 4.—The Queen's Bench Division has an innate and inherent authority to dismiss or to stay a frivolous or a vexatious action. This authority is distinct from the authority conferred on it by ord. 25, r. 4, which is limited to pleadings which are frivolous or vexatious or otherwise objectionable.—Blair v. Cordner, Q.B.D. 64—19 Q. 18. Vendor and purchaser — Married woman — Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 9.—The court has no jurisdiction, upon a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to decide the question whether a restraint on anticipation affects the purchase-money, the question being one which does not concern the purchaser.—In re Tippett and Newbould, C.A. 597—37 Ch. JUSTICE of the PEACE:—

1. Conviction—Assault — Absence of prosecutor— 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27—Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 42.—A court of summary jurisdiction has no power to convict of a common assault unless the party aggrieved, or someone on his behalf, complains of the assault, with a view to the adjudication of the court upon it.—Nicholson v. Booth, Q.B.D.—57 L. J. M. C. 43.

2. Disqualification—Interest—Appeal.—If a justice of the peace has taken an active part in defending an appeal to which he was not a party, he is disqualified from taking part in the decision of the appeal.—Reg. v. Justices of Cumberland, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 491.

3. Disqualification—Interest—Witness.—A magistrate had visited, as medical attendant, a person who alleged that he had been assaulted. He strongly advised his patient not to prosecute, and afterwards received a communication from the person alleged to have committed the assault, in which an apology was tendered, and a desire expressed for an amicable settlement. It was alleged that he would be a necessary witness for the prosecution.

Held, that he was not disqualified from sitting to hear a summons taken out for the alleged assault, either on the ground of interest or because he might be called as a witness.—Reg. v. Farrant, Q.B.D. 184—20 Q. B. D. 58; 57 L. J. M. C. 17; 57 L. T. 880.

4. Habeas corpus — Depositions — Discharge of prisoner.—On a return to a writ of habeas corpus the court may look at the depositions to ascertain whether there was any evidence before the court of summary jurisdiction to support the conviction.—In re Sullivan, EX. D. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 98.

5. Information—Prosecutor—Police officer—Highway — Obstruction — Metropolis— General Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 72.—An information under section 72 of the General Highway Act for obstructing a highway within the metropolitan area was preferred by an inspector of police.

Held, that the section applied to highways within the metropolitan area, and that a prosecution thereunder could be initiated by the police.—Back v. Holmes, Q.B.D.—57 L. J. M. C. 37.

6. Information — Prosecutor — Police officer — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 259. —A local board passed a resolution appointing the superintendent and sergeants of the county police for the time acting within the district to prosecute offenders under certain sections of a local Act.

Held, that section 259 of the Public Health Act, 1875, did not authorise the local board to delegate prosecutions to persons not under the control of the board.—Kyle v. Barbor, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 229.

7. Jurisdiction — Claim of right — Highway—Obstruction — Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 89), s. 38.— A shopkeeper in a borough placed goods upon the pavement in front of his shop for sale. Upon being summoned under the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, for obstructing the footway, he contended that he had a bonâ fide right to place his goods there. The justices considered that their jurisdiction was ousted.

Held, that the justices ought to determine whether the land on which the goods were placed was part of the public highway or not; that no question of title was involved; and that their jurisdiction was not ousted. — Leicester Urban Sanitary Authority v. Holland, Q.B.D.—57 L. J. M. C. 75.

8. Jurisdiction—Claim of right—Trespass—Railway—Right of way—Regulation of Railways Act, 1868 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 70), s. 23.—The appellant was convicted by justices in petty sessions—(1) under a railway company's private Act, for having unlawfully trespassed on a railway in such a manner as to expose himself to danger; and (2) under the 23rd section of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, for having been unlawfully on the railway after receiving warning not to go or pass thereon. There was, prior to the making of the railway, and prior to the Acts of Parliament authorising the same, a public right of way for persons on foot over the land now occupied by the railway at the place where the appellant crossed, and the appellant went upon and crossed the railway in the assertion of the right of way which formerly existed, and believing that he was entitled to do so by virtue thereof.

Held, that the conviction on both summonses was wrong, because the claim of the right of way set up by the appellant ousted the jurisdiction of the justices to determine the case; and there were no provisions in the Act of Parliament extinguishing the right of way, which was consequently still in existence.—Croft v. Miles, Q.B.D. 784.

9. Jurisdiction—Committal—Division of county—Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), s. 22.—A person charged with an offence committed in one petty sessional division of a county may be committed for trial by the justices acting for any other division of the same county.—Reg. v. Beckley, C.C.R. 160—20 Q. B. D. 187; 57 L. J. M. C. 22; 57 L. T. 716.

10. Jurisdiction — False pretences — Conviction—Money in possession of prisoner—Restitution—Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 71), s. 29.—A. was arrested by a police constable, taken to a police station, and charged with obtaining two sums of 5s. each from D. and B. by false pretences. She was searched, and £108 was taken from her pocket. On the following day she was summarily convicted by a magistrate and sentenced to two consecutive terms of imprisonment.

Held, that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to order that the whole of the £108 should be restored to A.—Reg. v. D'Eyncourt, Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 109; 57 L. J. M. C. 64.

11. Jurisdiction—Husband and wife—Aggravated assault—Judicial separation—Discharge of order—Appeal—Special case—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 4.—The words "the court" in section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, do not mean the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, but the court before whom the husband is convicted, and that court alone can vary or discharge the order; but there is a right of appeal to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division even from the refusal of such court to vary or discharge any such order, and that right exists notwithstanding that the justices may have stated a case for the consideration of the Queen's Bench Division; but the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, as a matter of discretion, will not hear the appeal while there is a special case pending in the Queen's Bench Division.—Hetherington v. Hetherington, P.D. & A.D. 12—12 P. D. 112; 56 L. J. P. D. & A. 78; 57 L. T. 533.

T. 281.

13. Jurisdiction — Revenue — Excise — Penalty — Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 15), s. 4.—An information for the recovery of an excise penalty under section 4 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1887, may be preferred before a metropolitan police magistrate.—Reg. v. Ingham, Q.B.D. 811—21 Q. 14. Jurisdiction — Special case — Application in writing—Service—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 33—Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, r. 18.—The court has no jurisdiction to entertain a special case stated under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 33, unless the directions given by the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, r. 18, have been complied with.

15. Jurisdiction—Special case—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 33—Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, r. 18.—A court of summary jurisdiction has no power to state a special case under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, unless an application has been made to the court in writing, and unless a copy of such application has been left with the clerk of the court within seven days of the date of the proceeding to be questioned according to rule 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886.—South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. v. Stone, Q.B.D. 76—19 Q. B. D. 168; 56 L. J. M. C. 122.

16. Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17—Trial by jury—Imprisonment for over three months—Night poaching—9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1.—The offence of night poaching, for which a convicted person is liable to imprisonment for not more than three months, and at the expiration of that period to further imprisonment for six months in default of sureties not to so offend again, is not within section 17 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, so as to entitle the accused to claim a trial by a jury.—Williams v. Wynne, Q.B.D.—57 L. J. M. C. 30.

17. Summons—Refusal—Mandamus.—If a magistrate has refused a summons on the ground that an information discloses no indictable offence, the court has no jurisdiction to review his decision, as to law or fact.

Semble, there is no right on the part of the public to hold public meetings in Trafalgar-square, but the Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings have power to prohibit meetings there.—Ex parte Lewis, Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 191.

LAND DRAINAGE ACT.—See Nuisance, 2.

LANDLORD and TENANT:—

1. Distress — Privilege — Cattle — Agistment — Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 45.—Cattle placed in a field under an agreement between their owner and the tenant for the exclusive right of grazing the field are not "taken in to be fed" by the tenant so as to be protected from distress for rent by virtue of section 45 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883.

Semble, section 45 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, only applies to stock which is agisted, the words of the Act being a mere paraphrase of that term.—Masters v. Green, Q.B.D. 591—20 Q. B. D. 807.

2. Lease—Covenant—Breach—Offensive trade—Sub-lease—Notice.—A lease contained a covenant by the lessee and his assigns "not to use, exercise, or carry on upon the demised premises, or permit or suffer any part thereof to be occupied by any person who shall use, occupy, or carry on therein, any noisome or offensive trade," &c. E. purchased an underlease of the premises, with notice of the covenant in the original lease, and made a further sub-demise, containing a similar covenant, to M. M., after being in occupation some months, began to carry on an offensive business on the premises. The original lessor claimed an injunction against both E. and M.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that no injunction ought to be granted against E., there being no evidence to show that E. had authorised or sanctioned M. to occupy the premises to carry on therein an offensive business; and that E. was not to be compelled by means of an injunction to bring an action of ejectment against M.

299, 8 Q. B. D. 403, and Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham, 33 W. R. 807, 29 Ch. D. 750, followed.

Semble, that the words "shall not suffer or permit" in the covenant ought not to be construed as equivalent to "shall hinder and prevent," but rather as "shall not authorise or sanction."—Hall v. Ewin, C.A. 84—37 Ch. D. 74; 57 L. J. Ch. 95; 57 L. T. 831.

3. Lease—Forfeiture—Agreement—Specific performance—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14.—The notice required by section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, is necessary only where there is an actual existing lease or where there is an agreement for a lease of which the court will grant specific performance.—Swain v. Ayres, C.A. 798—21 Q. B. D. 289; 57 L. J. Q. B. 428.

4. Lease—Covenant—Licensed house—Sale of beer.—The lease of a public-house contained a covenant that the lessee and his assigns would during the term buy from the lessors all beer required for the business. There were provisions for re-entry for non-payment of rent or non-performance of covenants, and for reduction of rent so long as the lessee should buy beer from the lessors.

Held, that the covenant was an absolute one, and that the lessee had not an option of dealing with another brewer and paying the reduced rent.—Hanbury v. Cundy, CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. T. 155.

5. Lease — Covenant — Rent — Assignment — Surrender of part of premises.—A lease of a house and premises contained a covenant by the lessee to pay the reserved rent. The lessee assigned the term, and the assignee, in consideration of £25, surrendered to the lessor a small part of the premises, the value of which was not altered by the surrender.

Held, that the lessee was not relieved from his covenant to pay the rent.—Baynton v. Morgan, Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 101; 57 L. J. Q. B. 465.

6. Lease—Covenant—Restrictive covenant—Nuisance—"Business"—Hospital—Injunction.—A lease contained a covenant by the lessee with the lessor not to carry on upon the demised premises, besides certain trades specifically mentioned, "any other noisome, obnoxious, or offensive trade or business, nor suffer any act or thing which shall or may be or grow to the annoyance, nuisance, grievance, or damage of the lessor or the inhabitants of the neighbouring or adjacent houses." An under-lessee used the premises as a hospital for the treatment of disease of the nose, ear, skin, and eye, fistula, and other diseases.

Held, that the user of the premises as a hospital was an infringement of the covenant.

Bramwell v. Lacy, 27 W. R. 463, 10 Ch. D. 691, followed.—Tod-Heatly v. Benham, CH.D. KEK., J. 688—59 L. T. 25.

7. Lease—Covenant—Sub-lease—Collateral covenant.—A. sub-leased to B. in 1869 premises held under two leases dated respectively in 1848 and 1863, except certain property sub-leased in 1867, for the residue of A.'s term. The sub-lease of 1869 contained a covenant by B. for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to pay all taxes, rates, assessments, and outgoings in respect of the demised premises, and also all sums not exceeding £100 in one year as should be payable by A., his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, on account of such taxes, rates, assessments, and outgoings in respect of the property sub-leased in 1867. The property underleased in 1869 was afterwards assigned to H. for the residue of the term.

Held, that the covenant to pay the taxes, rates, assessments, and outgoings upon the property sub-leased in 1867 did not run with the land sub-leased in 1869, and was not binding on H.—Gower v. Postmaster-General, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 527.

8. Lease—Covenant—Waste—Tenant by curtesy—Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18), s. 46.—A tenant by the curtesy of a freehold tenement, granted, in exercise of the power contained in section 46 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877, a lease of the premises for twenty-one years, and died soon afterwards. The lease contained a covenant by the lessee that he would "at all times during the term keep the premises in good and substantial repair, and the same in good and substantial repair deliver up to the lessor, at the expiration or sooner determination of the term, fair wear and tear and damage by tempest excepted."

Held, in an action by the owner in fee of the premises to set aside the lease, that the lease was invalid as it was "not made without impeachment of waste," and therefore did not conform to the conditions of section 46 of the Act.

9. Lease—Rent—Distress—Administration action—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 42, 125.—Part of a testator's estate consisted of leaseholds, and after his death his estate was found to be insolvent, and an action was commenced in the Chancery Division for the administration of the testator's estate by his lessor, who claimed as landlord to distain upon the demised premises for six years' arrears of rent.

Held, that the landlord was entitled to distrain for six years' arrears of rent, and that section 42 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, did not apply so as to limit the landlord's right to one year's rent only.—Fryman v. Fryman, CH.D. CHI., J. 631—38 Ch. D. 468; 58 L. T. 872.

10. Lease — Reservation — Way — Merger — Extinguishment.—D. and C., as co-owners, demised land for 1,000 years for the purpose of making a canal, it being provided that nothing should prevent D. and C., their heirs or assigns, from using any of the demised land or any stream of water flowing over the same, or from granting way-leaves across the same, but so as not to injure the canal. After the canal had been made the estate was partitioned between D. and C., the reversion of part of the canal being conveyed to C., and the land adjacent to such part of it being conveyed to D. C. afterwards conveyed the reversion of the canal to lessees. D. claimed a right to grant way-leaves and to build a bridge over the part of the canal which had been conveyed to C.

Held, that the proviso in the lease operated as a covenant with D. and C. as the owners of the reversion, and not as adjacent landowners; and that there had been a merger, and the rights under the proviso had been extinguished.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal (reported 34 W. R. 777, 33 Ch. D. 420) affirmed.—Lord Dynevor v. Tennant, H.L.—13 App. 279; 59 L. T. 3.

11. Waste—Tenantable repair—Damage.—Under an agreement for a lease for five years of a dwelling-house, the tenant was to leave the house in tenantable repair. The landlord at the end of the tenancy, which continued for seventeen years, sued for damages, upon the footing that the tenant was liable to paper and paint and leave the house in the same condition as when he took it.

Held, that the landlord was not entitled to damages on that footing, but that he was entitled to compensation for waste, the tenant being liable to paint sufficiently to preserve the woodwork, but not to do papering or decorative painting.

Decision of Cave, J., affirmed.—Crawford v. Newton, C.A. 54.

LANDLORD and TENANT (IRELAND):—

1. Lease—Covenant—Assignment—Consent—Indorsement by lessor's agent—Retrospective effect.—The lessee under a lease containing covenants against alienation assigned it by a settlement, and the lessor's consent to such assignment was indorsed on the lease by the lessor's agent without the lessor's written permission.

Held, that the consent indorsed on the lease was invalid, and that, even if valid, it would not give the assignee, not being in possession, a right of action for previous trespass.—McGrath v. Ahern, C.P.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 341.

2. Lease—Covenant—Fixtures—Improvements.—In 1804 the owners of freehold premises agreed to demise the property for lives renewable for ever, the intended lessee agreeing to pull down a mill and build a new one, and covenanting to keep the mill and works in working order and repair. In 1823 a lease was executed, the lessee covenanting to keep all buildings, works, and improvements in order and repair, and to yield up the premises and buildings and improvements in like order and repair. In 1829 the lease was renewed, with similar covenants, and in 1834 an underlease for 999 years was executed. In 1862 the defendants became assignees of the underlease, and erected new and improved machinery. In 1874 the landlord and the defendants executed an agreement reciting the former lease and underlease, and giving the defendants permission to erect a steam-engine.

Held, that the defendants were not at liberty to remove any tenant's fixtures or new machinery.—Cosby v. Shaw, V.C. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 307.

3. Lease—Covenant—Tenancy in common—Joint and separate covenant.—A covenant by lessees to hold to A. and B., their executors, administrators, and assigns, as tenants in common for a term of years, contained a covenant by A. and B., that they, or some or one of them, their executors, administrators, or assigns, would pay the reserved rent, and keep the premises in repair.

Held, that the covenant was joint and several.—Tyndall v. White, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 517.

3a. Lease—Covenant—Tenancy in common—Joint covenant.—Property was leased to A. and B., their executors, administrators, and assigns, "as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants," at a yearly rent. A. and B. covenanted for themselves, their executors, administrators, and assigns, that they, or some one of them, would pay the rent and keep the premises in repair. A. died during the term, and the lessor sued A.'s executors and B. for breaches of covenant committed after A.'s death.

Held, that the covenants were joint, and not several, and that A.'s executors were not liable.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal in Ireland.—White v. Tyndall, H.L.—13 App. 263; 58 L. T. 741.

4. Lease—Rent—Non-payment—Ejectment—Redemption—Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 154), s. 71.—The redemption by a tenant or a person having a specific interest in a lease, evicted for non-payment of rent, has the effect of setting aside a judgment in ejectment, and restoring the lease and all sub-tenancies.—Lombard v. Kennedy, V.C. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 201.

5. Lease—Surrender—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), ss. 20, 21—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 30), s. 1.—In 1886 a tenant surrendered to his landlord a lease for two lives or thirty-one years, and accepted a tenancy from year to year at a reduced rent.

Held, that the transaction was not invalid under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.—Cooke v. Torrens, C.A. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 239.

6. Lease for lives—Expiration—Remainderman—Present tenancy—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 21.—By a marriage settlement land held for a term of years was vested in trustees, upon trust for the settlor for life, and afterwards, in events which happened, for the plaintiff for life. The settlement contained no power to lease. The owners of the two first limited estates made a joint lease to the defendant for their own lives. The last surviving lessor died after the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and the plaintiff afterwards sued to recover possession of the land.

Held, that section 21 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, did not create a present tenancy in the defendant.—Massy v. Norse, C.A. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 464.

7. Lease from year to year—Fair rent—Penal rent—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 5.—The plaintiff leased land to A. to hold for one year from the 25th of March, 1878, and so on from year to year till a determination of the tenancy by notice at an annual rent of £660, and an additional £10 for every acre broken up or meadowed beyond a specified amount. A. covenanted to pay the said rent and any additional rent, and not to meadow more than forty-five acres. The lease reserved a right of re-entry for any breach of covenant. A. meadowed more than the specified quantity of land, and the Land Commission afterwards fixed £600 as the fair rent of the holding.

Held, that the fair rent fixed by the Land Commission did not include the additional rent payable under the special covenants.—O'Connor v. Smith, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 393.

8. Notice to quit—Increase of rent.—A notice to quit which is not acted upon, but is abandoned by both parties during its currency, is not sufficient to terminate a tenancy from year to year.

Increase of rent from a yearly tenant, agreed upon during a year of tenancy, is not enough to create a new tenancy.—Lord Inchiquin v. Lyons, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 474.

9. Notice to quit—Notice of surrender—Notices to Quit (Ireland) Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 63), s. 1.—"Notice to quit" under the Notices to Quit (Ireland) Act, 1876, includes a tenant's notice of surrender.—In re O'Brien, C.A. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 429.

10. Purchase by tenant—Vesting order—Incumbrance—Guarantee deposit—Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 73), ss. 2, 3, 12.—On a proposed sale by a landlord to a tenant, if the landlord's estate is incumbered beyond the amount of the purchase-money, the Land Commission will not, against the incumbrancer's consent, retain any part of the purchase-money as a guarantee deposit, even if it has been agreed to carry out the sale by a vesting order under section 12 of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885.—In re Colthurst, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 468.

11. Recovery of land—Stay of proceedings—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, s. 30, sub-section 1.—An order under section 30, sub-section 1, of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, for stay of proceedings and payment by instalments of debt and costs will not be made before judgment.—Wallis v. Meany, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 496.

12. Recovery of land—Sub-letting—Invalid tenancy—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, ss. 2, 15.—Section 15 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, cannot give validity to a tenancy which is invalid under section 2.—Ormsby v. Crean, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 526.

13. Rent—Judicial rent—Estoppel—Contract.—In 1884 a lessee for a term of which fifty years were unexpired at an annual rent of £200, being within the statutory exemptions from disability to contract, signed a consent, which was afterwards made a rule of court, that he should be released from £100 arrears of rent, and that, by an indorsement on the lease, the rent should be reduced to £150, payable at the half-yearly dates mentioned in the lease, notwithstanding any future legislation.

Held, that the tenant was entitled to apply to the court to fix a fair rent.—Ferguson v. Bradstreet, C.A. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 303.

14. Rent—Judicial rent—Lease—Sub-letting—Covenant—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, ss. 21, 57.—After the expiration of a lease, which contained a covenant against sub-letting, the lessee held the land as tenant from year to year. Before the date of the lease the lessee had, with the knowledge of the lessor's agent, sub-let a small portion of the land.

Held, that the tenant was entitled to apply to have a judicial rent fixed.—Keating v. Bolton, C.A. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 143.

15. Rent—Judicial rent—Pasturage—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 58.—In May, 1870, 67 acres of land were let for one year, the tenant agreeing to use the land, then in grass, for grazing only, except as much meadow as should be required for stock. The rest of the land was let to other persons. In 1871 a new agreement was made, by which, after a recital that the farm had been always let for grazing purposes, and was over £50 in value, the tenant contracted himself out of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1870.

Held, that the tenant was not entitled to apply to have a judicial rent fixed.—Flannery v. Nolan, C.A. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 537.

16. Rent—Judicial rent—Pasturage—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 58.—In 1855 343 acres of land were let on lease at an annual rent of £371. The lease contained covenants by the lessee not to break up the land without the lessor's consent, and to cultivate in a proper manner, but there was no prohibition of selling hay. The lessee had verbally agreed to take the land as a grazing farm. The lease having expired, the tenant applied to have a judicial rent fixed.

Held, that the application must be refused.—Battersby v. Nicholson, C.A. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 38.

17. Rent—Judicial rent—Pasturage—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 58.—In 1880 land was let from year to year at 30s. per acre for 126 acres, the remaining thirty acres consisting of commonage, for which no rent was fixed, the Government valuation of the property being more than £50. The tenant agreed not to sell hay, and not to till more than twenty acres, and to pay the whole of the county cess.

Held, that the tenant was entitled to apply to have a judicial rent fixed.—Holmes v. Lander, C.A. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 47.

18. Rent—Judicial rent—Turbary—Order of Land Commission—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 5, sub-section 5.—An order of the Land Commissioners fixing a fair rent does not alter the landlord's existing right of turbary; and, if the turbary is reserved to the landlord, the order gives the tenant no right to cut turf.—Knox v. Baxter, V.C. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 460.

19. Rent—Set-off—Abatement of nuisance.—Money expended by a tenant in abating a structural nuisance, after a magistrate's order to abate, which has been served only on the tenant, cannot be set off against accruing rent.—Butcher v. Ruth, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 380.

LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT:—

1. Compulsory powers—Compensation—Building contract.—A land company had power, under several agreements with the leasing authority under an Estate Act, to enter and build upon part of the estate houses of a certain value, which were to be completed within a specified period. A railway company promoted, before the expiration of that period, a scheme for a railway passing through the lands, and the land company obtained an indefinite extension of the time for completion of the houses from the leasing authority. The railway company obtained an Act authorising the railway, and gave the usual notice to treat to the land company, who made no claim. The railway company entered into possession, denying that any interest in the land was vested in the land company. The land company brought an action claiming a declaration that the agreements were still subsisting, and that compensation ought to be assessed and paid to them on that footing.

Held, that the action would lie, and that the court had jurisdiction to make a declaration in the terms asked, the exact amount of compensation to be settled by an arbitrator under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

East and West India Docks Co. v. Gattke, 3 Mac. & G. 155, and London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Cross, 34 W. R. 201, 31 Ch. D. 354, distinguished.—Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., CH.D. KEK., J. 414—33 Ch. D. 295; 57 L. J. Ch. 106; 57 L. T. 800.

2. Compulsory powers—Compensation—Light—Prospective injury—Termination of lease—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 6, 16.—Compensation cannot be claimed under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, for prospective injurious affection of property.

The plaintiffs held their premises under a lease for seventeen years, terminable at their option at the end of three years by a six months' notice. Six months before the three years came to an end they perceived that certain buildings which had been commenced by a railway company on land adjoining their premises would so darken their premises as to make them useless, and they consequently gave notice to their landlord to determine the lease at the end of the three years.

Held, that the claim for compensation must be limited to the damage from injurious affection sustained before the date on which the lease actually determined, and must not be assessed on the basis of the lease having fourteen years to run.—Reg. v. Poulter, C.A. 117—20 Q. B. D. 132; 57 L. J. Q. B. 138; 58 L. T. 534.

3. Compulsory powers—Notice to treat—Part of house—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 92.—The plaintiff was the owner of a piece of land, fronting a private road, whereon he had built for himself a dwelling-house. He afterwards bought some land fronting the same road on the other side, immediately opposite his dwelling-house, and built stables, coach-house, and greenhouses on part thereof, and laid out the rest as a garden, all of which he used together with and as part of his residence. A railway company gave notice to treat for the piece of land whereon the stables, &c., were situate.

Held, that the railway company could not be compelled, under section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to take the dwelling-house also. —Kerford v. Seacomb and Hoylake Railway Co., CH.D. KEK., J. 431—57 L. J. Ch. 270; 58 L. T. 445.

4. Payment into court—Investment—Charity lands—Petition—Costs—Ord. 55, r. 2—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 80.—A scheme for the regulation of a charity provided that the legal estate in the lands and all interests therein should be vested in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands and his successors, in trust for the charity, with intent that the lands might be managed by the trustees of the charity in conformity with the scheme, and that all stock in the public funds and other securities should be vested in the Official Trustee, by whom the dividends and income should be paid to the trustees of the charity. The land was acquired by the Metropolitan Board of Works under compulsory powers, and the purchase-money was paid into court. The trustees petitioned, before the conveyance had been completed, that the fund in court might be invested and carried to the account of the Official Trustee, who was served with the petition.

Held, that an order for interim investment should be made; that the proceedings had been properly commenced by summons; and that the costs of the Official Trustee should be paid by the Metropolitan Board of Works.—In re Stafford, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 846.

5. Payment out of court—Costs—Lease—Appearance of lessor—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, ss. 74, 80.—A petition was presented by the lessee of property compulsorily taken by a railway company for payment out of court of a fund representing compensation under an award. At the date of the award rent was due to the lessor, who had a right of re-entry in default of payment. At the date of payment into court the railway company had not completed the purchase of the lessor's interest. After the purchase the lessor gave notice to the railway company of his claim to rent out of the fund in court claimed. He received notice of the presentation of the petition from the railway company and appeared at the hearing, though not served with, nor made a respondent to, the petition, and his claim was settled by the petitioners.

Held, that the right of re-entry was an incumbrance on the leasehold interest and on the fund in court, and that, notice having been given to the railway company by the lessor, he was rightly before the court, and the company must pay his costs.—In re London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 673.

6. Payment out of court—Petition—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, ss. 69, 70, 80—Ord. 55, r. 2. —An application that part of the compensation for land taken under a Waterworks Act may be paid to a trustee may be made by petition.—In re Hargreave's Trusts, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 367.

LIBEL:—

1. Falsehood—Guilty knowledge—Conviction for publication only.—On an indictment for publishing a libel knowing it to be false the defendant may be convicted of publishing only.—Boaler v. Reg., Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 284; 57 L. J. M. C. 85.

2. Patent—Infringement—Trade libel—Reasonable and probable cause—Damages.—The defendants sent to their customers a circular, in which they stated that they were unable to supply a particular kind of electric bell, invented by the plaintiff, because it had been "proved to be an infringement" of another patented bell. No action had then been brought against the plaintiff for infringement of the patent. Such an action was afterwards commenced, but was abandoned.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to damages.—Crampton v. Swete, CH.D. KEK., J—58 L. T. 516.

3. Privilege—Fair criticism—Question for jury.—In actions for libel conveyed in the public criticism of literary work, the only questions for the jury are, What is the meaning of the words used, and does such meaning come within the limits of fair criticism? Imputations on the private character of the author or an account of the work so false as to amount to an actual misdescription of it are outside the limits of "fair criticism." The expression of the opinion of the critic, not the opinion itself, is the criterion of "fair criticism."

Per Lord Esher, M.R.—If it could be shown that the critic had written the words complained of, not for the purpose of criticism, but with a malicious intent to injure the author, that might make a statement libellous which, if written without such intent, would not be beyond the limits of "fair criticism."

No question of privilege arises in reference to public criticism in accordance with the judgments in Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 11 W. R. 569.

4. Publication—Husband and wife—Servant—Testimonial—Damages.—The disclosure of a libel by a husband to a wife is not a publication of it.

A servant has the property in a testimonial given to him by a former employer, as distinguished from a letter testifying to his character sent by a former employer to a new employer; and if the testimonial is damaged by the new employer the servant may recover substantial damages.—Wennhak v. Morgan, Q.B.D. 697—20 Q. LICENSED HOUSE:—

1. Excise licence—Place of public entertainment—Mandamus—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39, s. 7—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), ss. 3, 72, 74.—The proprietor of a place of public entertainment is not entitled to an excise licence unless he has previously obtained a justices' licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

The statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39, s. 7, has been impliedly repealed as to places of public entertainment by the Licensing Act, 1872.—Reg. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Q.B.D. 696; 57 L. J. M. C. 92.

2. Forfeiture—Transfer—Discretion of justices—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), ss. 8, 19—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 15.—Where the holder of a licence had been convicted of an offence under section 15 of the Licensing Act, 1872, the justices refused the application of a new tenant for a renewal; and of the landlord for a transfer;

Held, that the justices were entitled to do so, as the licence had become forfeited, and that section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, did not apply.—Reg. v. Justices of West Riding, Q.B.D. 855—21 Q. B. D. 258; 57 L. J. M. C. 103.

3. Permitting gaming—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 17.—An innkeeper kept a skittle-alley on his premises. He put up a general notice that no gaming was permitted in the alley, and he placed O. in charge of the alley, with express directions not to allow gaming. Two men were found by constables playing cards for money in the alley in the presence of O. and to his knowledge.

Held, that the innkeeper was rightly convicted of "suffering gaming to be carried on upon his premises" under section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872.—Bond v. Evans, Q.B.D. 767—21 Q. B. D. 249.

4. Renewal—Discretion of justices—9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 1—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 42—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 26.—The justices at the annual general licensing sessions have the same absolute judicial discretion to grant or to refuse applications for the renewal of licences as they have in respect of granting or refusing applications for new licences for the purposes specified in the Licensing Acts. The provisions in section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and in section 26 of the Licensing Act, 1874, only modify the procedure in cases of applications for renewal, and do not limit in any way the judicial discretion intrusted to the justices by section 1 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61.—Sharp v. Wakefield, Q.B.D. 634—21 Q. B. D. 66; 58 L. T. 494.

5. Renewal—Discretion of justices—Beer licence—Wine licence—Discretion of justices—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, ss. 7, 19.—The holder of a beer licence existing on May 1, 1869, is not thereby entitled to apply for a wine licence on the renewal of his beer licence under section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, and the justices are entitled to refuse at their discretion any application for a licence other than for the licence originally existing at that date.—Reg. v. King, C.A. 600—20 Q. B. D. 430; 57 L. J. M. C. 20.

6. Renewal—Objection by justices—Evidence not on oath—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 42, sub-sections 2, 3.—It is not competent for justices to refuse to grant the renewal of a licence on account of an objection originated by themselves, unless they have first given notice of objection and taken evidence in accordance with the provisions contained in section 42, sub-sections 2, 3, of the Licensing Act, 1872.—Gascoyne v. Bisley, Q.B.D. 605.

7. Renewal—Six-day licence—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 49.—Although the condition under section 49 of the Licensing Act, 1872, requiring licensed premises to be closed during the whole of Sunday can only be inserted in a licence if the applicant himself applies for its insertion, yet, when it is once inserted, the licence becomes a six-days' licence, and can only be renewed as such.—Reg. v. Justices of Crewkerne, Q.B.D. 629—21 Q. B. D. 85.

8. Sale of liquor—Dilution of beer—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 51), s. 8.—A. had in his cellar a cask of strong beer and also a cask of much weaker beer. He drew off a certain quantity of the stronger beer and filled the cask again with some of the weaker beer, thereby reducing the specific gravity of the cask of stronger beer from 10 to 8.

Held, that A. was liable to conviction for diluting the stronger beer, under section 8, sub-section 2, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885.—Crofts v. Taylor, Q.B.D. 47—19 Q. B. D. 254; 56 L. J. M. C. 137; 57 L. T. 210.

An Inland Revenue officer went to his shop, asked for a bottle of the best sherry, and bought a bottle labelled "Best Pale Sherry, British."

Held, that the respondent had been guilty of the offence of selling foreign wine by retail without a proper licence.—Richards v. Banks, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 634.

LIFE INSURANCE:—

1. Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund—Lunacy of subscriber—Nominee—Admission—56 Geo. 3, c. lxxiii., s. 9.—A subscriber to the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund, established under 56 Geo. 3, c. lxxiii., is not given, by the Act or the regulations made thereunder, any interest in the insurance fund as his estate or property, but only a power of disposition over it in certain particular ways.

North, J., held that, under the regulations, a "nominee" must be a person who is to take a beneficial interest in the fund, and that there cannot be a nomination of a person who is to take as trustee for others.

The Court of Appeal, under the circumstances of the case, abstained from giving any decision on that point, but expressed an opinion that a nomination need not state that the "nominee" is to take beneficially, and that the object of the regulations referred to was merely to give the directors of the fund information in exercising their discretion as to admission, as to the purposes for which a nomination was made, and as to the parties who were to receive the money.

At the trial of the action the defendant's counsel made an admission that an order made by the Court of Session of Scotland nominating the curator of a lunatic subscriber on behalf of the lunatic as "nominee," had the same effect as if it had been a nomination made by the subscriber himself while sane.

Held, that the question of the jurisdiction of the Scotch court to make such an order was a question of fact, proof of which, like proof of other facts, might be dispensed with by the admission of counsel.—Urquhart v. Butterfield, C.A. 376—37 Ch. D. 357; 57 L. J. Ch. 521; 57 L. T. 780.

LIGHT:—

1. Implied grant — Lease — Derogation—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 6, sub-section 2.—In September, 1882, the corporation of a town demised to the plaintiff, in pursuance of a previous building agreement, a piece of land with the house newly built thereon, "together with the rights, members, and appurtenances to the said premises belonging," but no express mention was made of "lights." The plaintiff's house faced a new street made by the corporation, which street the corporation agreed should be twenty feet in width. At the date of the plaintiff's lease there was a low building on a piece of land on the side of this new street facing the plaintiff's premises, and in 1886 the corporation demised for building purposes this piece of land to the defendant, who built a high hotel thereon. The tract of land on which both the plaintiff's and the defendant's houses were built had been acquired by the corporation under an improvement scheme for building purposes, and this fact was known to the plaintiff when he entered into his agreement with the corporation. The plaintiff claimed a mandatory injunction to restrain interference with the light which, but for the defendant's building, would have had access to the plaintiff's house.

Held, that there was no express grant of the light by the corporation to the plaintiff, and that it was not implied under section 6, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881; that any implied obligation on the part of the corporation was to be measured by the circumstances which existed at the time when the agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the corporation; that there was no implied obligation on the corporation not to let the land fronting the new street and opposite to the plaintiff's premises for the erection of a building higher than that which existed thereon at the time; and that the action should be dismissed.

The maxim that a "grantor shall not derogate from his own grant" considered.

Rigby v. Bennett, 31 W. R. 222, 21 Ch. D. 559, approved.

Wheeldon v. Burrows, 28 W. R. 196, 12 Ch. D. 31, distinguished.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.—Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross, C.A. 914—57 L. J. Ch. 601.

2. Lease—Reservation—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3.—A lease for 999 years of a plot of building land, with a house which the lessee had erected on the land in pursuance of a building agreement, contained a demise of the house and land, "and all rights and appurtenances, legal, used, or reputed, to the said plot, except rights, if any, restricting the free use of any adjoining land, or the conversion or appropriation at any time hereafter of such land for building or other purposes, obstructive or otherwise."

Held, that the reservation in the lease was not an agreement within the proviso contained in section 3 of the Prescription Act, and did not prevent the lessee from acquiring a right to light under the Act.—Mitchell v. Cantrill, C.A. 229—37 Ch. D. 56; 57 L. J. Ch. 72; 58 L. T. 29.

3. Obstruction — Compulsory powers — Compensation—Injunction—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68—Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. cxxxv.), ss. 2, 4, 7, 25, 33—Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. cxxxii.), ss. 1—3.—By the Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877, which incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Metropolitan Board of Works were authorised to acquire land for the purpose, amongst other things, of widening Gray's-inn-road, and to purchase easements for that purpose. The board were also empowered, by section 33 of the Act, to let or sell certain portions of land for the purpose of building labourers' dwellings for the accommodation of labourers displaced by the improvements, the erection of which dwellings was imperatively required by the section. By an Amendment Act in 1882 the board were required to erect a certain number of labourers' dwellings on certain portions of land, without being expressly empowered to let or sell for that purpose, and section 33 of the principal Act was repealed. The board sold a building lease of portions of the land for the purpose of the erection of the required labourers' dwellings, and the tenants of the board, in erecting the dwellings, obstructed the ancient lights of adjacent owners.

Held, that the remedy of the adjacent owners was compensation under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and that they were not entitled to an injunction.—Wigram v. Fryer, CH.D. NOR., J. 100—36 Ch. D. 87; 56 L. J. Ch. 1098; 57 L. T. 255.

LIMITATIONS, STATUTE of:—

1. Acknowledgment — Payment of interest — Tenancy for life—21 Jac. 1, c. 16—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104, s. 5—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 14.—The law as to the effect of payment of interest on a simple contract debt of a testator by the tenant for life of the real estate stands on the same footing as the law as to payment of interest on a specialty debt.

The principle in Roddam v. Morley, 5 W. R. 510, 1 De G. J. & S. 1, discussed.

Payments made by a tenant for life under a will of real estate are sufficient admission of the liability of the real estate, and sufficient evidence to keep alive a simple contract debt of the testator.—Hollingshead v. Webster, CH.D. CHI., J. 660—37 Ch. D. 651; 57 L. J. Ch. 400; 58 L. T. 758.

2. Adverse possession—Tenancy in common—Receipt of rent—Infant—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 11.—A husband and wife were entitled, as tenants in common, to gavelkind land. The wife died in May, 1870, leaving two sons, S. and J. At the time of his mother's death J. was an infant. He attained the age of twenty-one in 1877, and died in May, 1884. On the mother's death her moiety descended to her two sons as her co-heirs, according to the custom of gavelkind, subject to the right of the father to a moiety of the rents so long as he remained a widower. On the death of the mother the father entered into receipt of the whole of the rents of her moiety without accounting to his sons or making any acknowledgment in writing of their title for more than twelve years. In February, 1884, the father married again. He died in November, 1884.

Held, that, as to the one-eighth of the property to which J. became entitled in possession on the death of his mother, the father must be presumed to have entered into receipt of the rents as bailiff for his infant son, and that, consequently, the title of J. was not barred by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 12; but that, as to S.'s own one-eighth, the same presumption did not arise, and that, as there was no evidence that the father had received the rents as agent for S., or had, before the expiration of twelve years, acknowledged his title in writing or accounted to him for the rents. S.'s title to that one-eighth was barred by the statute. —Hobbs v. Wade, CH.D. NOR., J. 445—36 Ch. D. 553; 57 L. J. Ch. 184; 58 L. T. 9.

3. Breach of trust—Death of sole trustee intestate —Action by heir-at-law—Ord. 19, r. 15.—The heir-at-law of a sole trustee who died intestate cannot set up the Statute of Limitations in an action by a cestui que trust to make the trustee's estate liable for a breach of trust.—Gillard v. Lawrenson, CH.D. STL., J. —57 L. T. 364.

4. Company — Shares — Forged transfer — Joint trustees—Estoppel.—One of two executors and trustees of a will sold out certain railway stock, which stood in their joint names as executors, by means of deeds of transfer to which he forged the name of his co-executor and trustee, who sued the railway company to compel them to replace the stock.

Held, (1) that the claim was not barred by reason of more than six years having elapsed since the date of the transfers, as time began to run, not from that date, but from the refusal of the company, when the forgery was made known to them, to treat the plaintiff as shareholder; (2) that stock registered in the names of two executors could not be transferred by one of them, and such a transfer was not good as to one moiety of the stock; (3) that the fact that one of the two joint owners of the stock was estopped from denying the validity of the forged transfers did not prevent the other from maintaining the action.—Barton v. North Staffordshire Railway Co, CH.D. KAY, J. 754—38 Ch. D. 458; 58 L. T. 549.

1. Arbitration—Award—Appointment of umpire—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 180 —Ord. 62, r. 15.—The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 180, requires the arbitrator appointed by the local authority to be under their common seal and the arbitrator appointed by the other party to be under his hand. The other party to an arbitration under the statute having appointed an arbitrator, but not under his hand, Held, that the appointment of the arbitrators, and the appointment of an umpire made by them, and the award of the umpire, were invalid, and neither the submission nor the award could be made a rule of court.—Gifford v. Bury Town Council, Q.B.D. 468—57 L. J. Q. B. 181; 58 L. T. 522.

2. Bye-law — Dwelling-house — Drainage — Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 23, 25, 157, 182, 183.—A bye-law made by an urban sanitary authority and ordering that no new house shall be occupied till the house drainage is complete, and such house has been, after examination, certified to be, in the opinion of the local board or its duly authorised officer, fit for human habitation, is valid within the Public Health Act, 1875.—Horsell v. Swindon Local Board, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 732.

3. Bye-law—Dwelling-house—Open space.—The L. Improvement Commissioners made a bye-law that every person erecting a new building to be used as a dwelling-house should provide in the rear an open space exclusively belonging thereto, to the extent at least of 150 square feet, free from any erection above the ground, and cause the distance across such open space between every such building and the opposite property at the rear to be 10ft. at least, and if such building be 25ft. in height should cause such distance across to be at least 20ft. P. erected a building to be used as a dwelling-house, 25ft. in height; there was in the rear an open space exclusively belonging thereto to the extent of 700 square feet; the distance across such open space between the building and the boundary of the opposite property at the rear, including the street which divided the building from the opposite property, was 52ft.; and the land exclusively belonging to the building was bounded in the rear by a public street, the distance across the open space between the building and the public street being 8ft.

Held, that as P. had not caused the distance across the open space between his building and the opposite property to be at least 20ft., he had committed a breach of the bye-law.—Jones v. Parry, Q.B.D.—57 L. T. 691.

4. Bye-law—Ultrà vires—Street music—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 90.—A bye-law made by the town council of a borough and providing that every person who in any street sounds any musical or noisy instrument, or sings, recites, or preaches without a written licence from the mayor, shall forfeit a sum not less than one shilling and not more than twenty shillings is unreasonable and ultrà vires.—Munro v. Watson, Q.B.D.—57 L. 5. Contract — Interest — Penalty — Public Health Act, 1875, s. 193.—By certain contracts entered into by a local authority for the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1875, it was provided that the contractors should pay to the surveyor of the local authority for taking out bills of quantities a percentage upon the amount which he should certify to be due from the local authority to the contractor.

Held, that the surveyor was concerned or interested in the contracts within the meaning of section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and was liable to a penalty in respect of each.

Decision of Mathew, J. (36 W. R. 553, 20 Q. B. D. 196), affirmed.—Whiteley v. Barley, C.A. 824—21 Q. B. D. 154.

6. Improvement rate — Several fishery — Town Improvement Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34, s. 167.—A several fishery is rateable to an improvement rate under a local Act incorporating the Town Improvement Clauses Act, 1847.—Redington v. Miller, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 78.

7. Sale of diseased meat—Servant—Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 116, 117.—A. was under-bailiff to B., it being his duty to obey the directions of the head bailiff. Two diseased cows belonging to B. were killed. A. was not present when they were killed, but the head bailiff told him to send the carcases to Portsmouth, and go there himself. A. did so, sending a telegram to a butcher at Portsmouth, with the words "make the best of it." The butcher declined to accept the meat, which was seized at the railway station.

Held, that A. could not be convicted for selling meat unfit for food.—Newton v. Monkcom, Q.B.D.—58 L. T. 231.

8. Sewers — Expenses — Apportionment — Adjacent owners—Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 13, 15, 18, 136, 207.—A piece of land having been laid out for building purposes, a system of sewerage was laid down. A local board for the district was subsequently formed and, sixteen years after its formation, an alteration in the sewerage system having become necessary, the board sought to charge the frontagers with the expense of such alteration under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, 35 W. R. 578, 18 Q. B. D. 577), that the powers given by section 150 could only be exercised once for all within a reasonable time after the vesting of the sewer in the local board, and that the alteration had been made under section 18, and was chargeable, under section 207, on the general rates, and not on the frontagers.—Holmes v. Twickenham Local Board, Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board, C.A. 50—20 Q. B. D. 63; 57 L. J. M. C. 1; 58 L. T. 299.

Held, that the board was bound to apportion the amount of the expenses among the different districts in proportion to the rateable value of the properties in those districts, to be ascertained according to the valuation list.—Darenth Valley Sewerage Board v. Dartford Guardians, Q.B.D. 43—19 Q. B. D. 270; 56 L. J. Q. B. 615; 57 L. T. 233.

10. Street—New street—Completion—New building —Consent of local authority—Local Government Act, 1875, s. 150.—A Local Improvement Act enacted that it should not be lawful for any person, except with the consent of the corporation, to erect any new buildings abutting on any new street unless the corporation should have approved of the level and available width of such new street, nor until the carriage way and footway should be formed to such level and of such width, and constructed and sewered to the satisfaction of the corporation in accordance with section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The appellants gave notice to the corporation of their intention to lay out a new street, the plans for the construction of which were approved by the corporation. They then gave notice that they intended to erect four new houses in the street, the plans of which were approved. The appellants erected the houses abutting upon part of the new street which had been sewered and paved to the satisfaction of the corporation; but the whole of the street had not been constructed to their satisfaction.

Held, that, as the appellants had given notice to lay out the whole of a new street, the corporation, under the local Act, were entitled to withhold their consent to the erection of any building abutting on the street unless the whole of the street was constructed and to their satisfaction.—Woodhill v. Mayor, &c., of Sunderland, Q.B.D.—57 L. LUNACY:—

1. Committee—Death of joint committee—Dividends —Fund in court—Payment to survivor.—At the date of the death of one of two joint committees of a lunatic the dividends on a fund in Consols representing the purchase-money of land of the lunatic acquired by the Metropolitan Board of Works under compulsory powers was payable to the joint committees. The surviving committee applied to be appointed sole committee, and that the dividends might be paid to him alone. The master in lunacy appointed him sole committee, but declined to make any order as to the dividends. The committee then served the Metropolitan Board of Works with a petition for payment to him of past and future dividends.

The court ordered the past and future dividends to be carried to the credit of the lunacy and to be paid to the petitioner, and ordered the Metropolitan Board of Works to pay the costs of the petition.—In re Ryder, LUN.—37 Ch. D. 595; 57 L. J. Ch. 459; 58 L. T. 783.

It was afterwards found that one of the beneficiaries had been found a lunatic by inquisition, but that no committee had been appointed, and the court made an order declaring the other beneficiaries to be seised of the property upon a trust within the Trustee Acts, and appointing another party to the action to convey the property for their estates.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction on a petition in lunacy to appoint a person to convey the lunatic's interest.—In re Watson, LUN.—58 L. T. 509.

3. Pauper lunatic—Maintenance—Statute of Limitations—21 Jac. 1, c. 16—Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97), s. 104.—Only six years' arrears of money paid for the past maintenance of a pauper lunatic, who has subsequently become entitled to property, are recoverable by guardians of the poor under section 104 of the Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853. —Eggleton v. Newbigin, CH.D. The usual practice, which is to direct the property to be sold, and then by a subsequent order to vest it in the purchaser under section 3 of the Trustee Act, 1850, should be adhered to.—In re Harwood, LUN. 27 —35 Ch. D. 470; 56 L. J. Ch. 974; 56 L. T. 502.

Held, that, whether or not the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies was an officer to whom a writ of mandamus might be sent, the appropriate remedy for the party aggrieved by such refusal was the procedure provided by sections 18 and 19 of the Stamp Act, 1870, and a writ of mandamus ought not to be granted.—Reg. v. Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, Q.B.D. 695—21 Q. MARINE INSURANCE:—

1. Concealment—Knowledge of agent—Underwriters instructed their agents to re-insure an overdue ship. During negotiations the agents received material information, which they did not make known to the underwriters, who re-insured the ship through these agents for £800. The underwriters afterwards re-insured the ship further for £700 through different agents. Neither the underwriters nor the last-named agents had the information which the first-named agents had. The ship was lost.

Held, that the knowledge of the first agents was not the knowledge of the underwriters so as to affect the second re-insurance, and that the underwriters were entitled to recover upon it.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 17 Q. B. D. 553, 34 W. R. Dig. 116) reversed.—Blackburn v. Vigors, H.L. 449—12 App. 518; 57 L. J. Q. B. 114; 57 L. T. 726.

2. Concealment—Knowledge of agent.—The plaintiffs, being the insurers of an overdue vessel, instructed R. & Co., brokers at Glasgow, to effect a re-insurance. R. & Co. telegraphed to T. & Co., brokers in London, to effect such re-insurance at a premium of fifteen guineas. Before any answer from T. & Co. arrived, M., one of the partners in the firm of R. & Co., obtained information of a fact material to the risk. On the arrival of an answer from T. & Co., asking for advance of premium, R. & Co. informed the plaintiffs thereof, but did not disclose to the plaintiffs the information obtained by M. The plaintiffs replied that the premium might be raised to twenty guineas. R. & Co. then telegraphed in the plaintiff's name to T. & Co. that they might pay twenty guineas. T. & Co. telegraphed in reply direct to the plaintiffs that there was no chance under twenty-five guineas. The plaintiffs then telegraphed to T. & Co. that they might pay twenty-five guineas. T. & Co., through the agency of another firm of brokers, effected a policy of re-insurance with the defendant.

Held, that as the policy was the result of one entire negotiation, conducted up to a certain point through the agency of R. & Co., though afterwards carried on by the principals themselves without further intervention on the part of R. & Co., the non-communication of M.'s knowledge vitiated the policy.

3. Mutual association—Forfeiture—Contribution—Set-off.—By the rules of a marine insurance association the members insured each other's ships from noon of the 20th of February, or from the date of entry of a vessel, until noon of the 20th of February in the succeeding year; and the managers were empowered to levy contributions of one-fourth of the estimated annual premium quarterly in each year to form a fund for payment of claims; if any member should refuse to pay his contributions, his ship should cease to be insured, and he should forfeit all claims in respect of any loss. On the 5th of April, 1881, a loss incurred in the year 1880 upon a ship belonging to the plaintiff, and insured in the association, was fixed by an average adjuster at £180. A call of £41 10s. on the plaintiff was, by mutual consent, set off against the loss. On the 13th of May, 1881, the association paid the plaintiff £100 on further account of the loss. On the 23rd of June a call was made on the plaintiff of £52 16s. 8d., and on the 5th of July another call of £31 4s. The plaintiff having tendered the balance, the association refused to accept it, and during the pendency of an action to recover the full amount of the two calls one of the plaintiff's ships was wholly lost.

Held, that the plaintiff had not forfeited his claim in respect of the loss.—Williams v. British Inland Marine Association, Q.B.D.—57 L. T. 27.

4. Partial loss—Repair—Restoration.—A ship insured under a time policy, had, above the main deck, a saloon deck for passengers. During the time covered by the policy the saloon deck was destroyed by fire. At the time of the fire the ship was engaged in carrying cargo, being useless for passengers. After the expiration of the policy the ship was converted into a cargo ship, and the saloon deck was not reinstated. The cost of converting the ship was less than the cost of the reinstatement of the saloon deck would have been. The ship, after the alteration, was as valuable for sale or use as before the accident. The owners sued the underwriters to recover the cost of reinstating the saloon deck.

Held, that the shipowners were not entitled to recover the cost of reinstatement, but only the cost of converting the ship.—Bristol Steam Navigation Co. v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Insurance Co., Q.B.D.—57 L. T. 101.

5. Perils of the sea—Injury to machinery.—By a policy of marine insurance on a steamship and machinery, including donkey-engine, boilers, pumps, and all connections, the perils insured against were the usual perils—namely, of the seas, men-of-war, fire, &c.—and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the subject-matter of the insurance. For the purposes of the voyage it was necessary to pump water into the main boilers by means of the donkey-engine and pump in the usual way; but, owing to a check-valve being stopped, the air-chamber in the pump became filled with water, and split.

Held, that the damage, whether caused by negligence or not, was not covered by the words "perils of the seas," or by the general words.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 34 W. R. 674, 17 Q. B. D. 195) reversed.

6. Total loss—Abandonment—Salvage—Sale of ship and cargo.—To constitute a total loss it is not necessary that a ship should be actually destroyed; but there is a constructive total loss if the owner has lost his right of property and possession by a sale under the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction in consequence of a peril insured against.

A ship was deserted by the master and crew, after they had brought it into a sinking condition. It was afterwards towed into port by salvors and was sold, as well as the cargo, under the decree of a court of admiralty, for less than the cost of the salvage services.

Held, that the sale constituted a total loss of the ship and cargo.—Cossman v. West; Cossman v. British American Assurance Co., P.C.—13 App. 160; 57 L. J. P. C. 17; 58 L. T. 122.

7. Warranty—General average—Particular average.—Under a policy of insurance covering all losses not recoverable under a policy of insurance containing the clause "warranted free from average under three per cent., unless general, or the ship is stranded, sunk, or burnt," the insured are entitled to recover if the particular average loss is less than three per cent., although if added to the general average loss it would be more than three per cent., if the ship be not stranded, sunk, or burnt.—Price v. A1 Ships Small Damage Insurance Co., Q.B.D.—57 L. J. Q. B. 459.

MARKET:—

Disturbance — Franchise — Fair — Injunction.—Under a grant of holding markets and fairs in or at a town the limits of the franchise include all the town.

If there is a franchise right to hold markets or fairs and take tolls in respect thereof, and an authorised market or fair is held within a reasonable distance of the prescribed place, and within the limit of the grant, on the day prescribed by the grant, a disturbance of the right will be implied; if the acts are done outside the prescribed limits and on other days than those prescribed by the grant, actual disturbance and injury to the right must be held.

Every person who takes part in, or knowingly takes advantage of, an illegal combination to disturb a franchise is guilty of combination.

The right to set up a market or fair is a prerogative right, and cannot be a public right.—Marquis of Downshire v. O'Brien, V.C. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 380.

MASTER and SERVANT:—

1. Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-section 1; s. 2, sub-section 1—Negligence—"Defect of machinery."—The mere fact that a machine is dangerous to the workmen using it does not constitute a "defect in the condition of the machine" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

The plaintiff was employed at a carding machine at the defendants' mill. In the machine was a vertical wheel which revolved upon a bed-plate, and in the vertical surface of the wheel there were large holes. It was the plaintiff's duty to place a leather band over the wheel while in motion. Upon the occasion in question, while engaged in putting the band on the wheel, the plaintiff's thumb was caught in one of the holes and was cut off. There was evidence that the holes were dangerous and of no use except to lessen the weight of the wheel, and the defendants had carding machines both with solid and open wheels. The machine had been in use for many years without any accident happening, and no complaint had been made.

Held (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that there was no evidence of any "defect in the condition of the machine" for which the defendants were liable within section 1, sub-section 1, and section 2, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880,—Walsh v. Whiteley, C.A. 876.

2. Employers' Liability Act, 1880, s. 1, sub-sections 2, 3; s. 8—Negligence—Fellow-servant—Foreman.—The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as one of a gang of labourers, of whom B. was the foreman, in stowing bales of wool in the hold of a ship. B. was himself a labourer, but stood at the top of the hatchway to signal to the men below when a bale was about to be lowered. The plaintiff was injured by a bale being lowered, as he alleged, without warning from B.

Held, that there was no evidence that the injury resulted from the negligence of any person having "any superintendence intrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence," or from "the negligence of any person to whose orders the plaintiff was bound to conform while conforming to the said orders" within the meaning of section 1, sub-sections 2 and 3, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 36 W. R. 335, 19 Q. B. D. 585) affirmed.—Kellard v. Rooke, C.A. 875.

3. Employers' Liability Act, 1880, ss. 1, 8—Negligence—Horse—Knowledge of workman.—The plaintiff was employed as a driver by the defendant, who was a wharfinger. The foreman of the defendant's stables told the plaintiff to drive a horse which was so vicious as to be unfit to be driven by anybody. The plaintiff objected to driving the horse, but was ordered to do so. While driving in the performance of his duty, and guilty of no negligence in driving, he was injured by a kick from the horse.

Held, (1) that the plaintiff was a workman within section 8 of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880; (2) that the horse was "plant" used in the defendant's business, and that vice in the horse was a "defect in the condition of the plant" within section 1; (3) (Lopes, L.J., dissenting), that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant's foreman, and that it was not conclusively shown that the risk was voluntarily incurred by the plaintiff.

685, distinguished.—Yarmouth v. France, Q.B.D. 281—20 Q. B. D. 447; 57 L. J. Q. B. 7.

4. Employers' Liability Act, 1880, s. 7—Notice of action—Service—Evidence.—A notice of action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, omitted the address of the person injured, and also the cause of injury, and gave the date of the accident incorrectly. The county court judge was of opinion that the defendants were not prejudiced by any defect or inaccuracy in the notice, and that there had been no intention to mislead.

Held, that the notice was valid.

It was proved that the notice was posted, though not in a registered letter, to the defendants on the day before the day on which the six weeks from the accident elapsed, and a reply was received from the defendants' solicitors a few days afterwards.

Held, that there was evidence on which the county court judge might find that the notice was received within the six weeks.—Previdi v. Gatti, Q.B.D. 670.

5. Negligence—Contributory negligence—Statutory duty—Employers' Liability Act, 1880, s. 1, sub-section 2—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), s. 52.—The plaintiff's husband had been employed in the defendant's coal mine, where it was the custom that the banksman, though required to be constantly in attendance at the mine while men were ascending or descending under section 52 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, should not be present during the night. The plaintiff's husband was killed while ascending at night, in consequence of an accident caused by the absence of the banksman.

Held, in an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, that the maxim Volenti non fit injuria did not apply, as the injury was caused by the breach of a statutory duty.—Baddeley v. Earl Granville, Q.B.D. 63—19 Q. B. D. 423; 56 L. J. Q. B. 501; 57 L. T. 268.

6. Negligence—Machinery.—A. died from the result of injuries while serving as an officer on board of the defendants' steamship. A derrick was being hoisted from the deck to the mast, for the purpose of discharging cargo, by a rope which worked through an iron bolt fixed in a trestle tree. The bolt broke, and A. was crushed by the derrick. The greater part of the rope was covered up, and could not be examined without being drawn out of the trestle tree. The bolt was in a defective condition, and there was no skilled person on the vessel to examine the machinery. None of the defendants' servants knew the condition of the bolt. When the accident happened the derrick was being used in the usual manner.

Held, in an action by A.'s widow under Lord Campbell's Act, that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants.—Agnew v. Ardnamult Steamship Co., EX.D. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 55.

7. Wages — Mining — Deductions — Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, ss. 17, 18.—The owners of a coal mine agreed with the persons employed in the mine that the mineral contracted to be gotten should be clean coal of a certain size, that coals sent from the stalls and headings should be paid for at a certain rate, and that no slack should be paid for, but all slack should be deducted. By section 17 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, where the amount of wages paid to miners depends on the amount of mineral gotten, the miners shall be paid according to the weight of mineral gotten, but the owner may agree with the miners to deduct in respect of stones or materials other than mineral contracted to be gotten.

Held (Fry, L.J., dissenting), that the agreement was within the Act, and that the agreement for deduction of slack, being unauthorised by the Act, was void; and that the miners were entitled to be paid at the agreed rate for all coal sent up by them.

2. Nuisance — Drain — Sewer—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 68, 72, 74, 76, 250.—The duty imposed by section 72 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, on a district board to keep the sewers which are by the Act vested in them so as not to be a nuisance, is not an absolute duty, but only a duty to use all reasonable care and diligence to keep the sewers in a proper condition, and the board will not be liable for a nuisance caused by a drain which has, by reason of another drain being connected with it, become a "sewer" if they did not know before action brought, and could not, by the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered that the drain was a "sewer."—Balmoral v. Poplar District Board, CH.D. Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover from the defendants one-half of the expenses incurred in paving the street under section 105 of the earlier Act.—Camberwell Vestry v. Greenwich District Board, Q.B.D. 126—19 Q. B. D. 502; 56 L. J. Q. B. 636.

MINING:—

Canal—Subjacent minerals—Right to support—Compensation.—A canal company's Act provided that nothing therein contained should affect the right of landowners to the mines and minerals within or under the land to be used for the canal, and that, if the owner or worker of any coal or other mine should work near or under the canal, so as, in the opinion of the company, to endanger or damage the canal, or, in the opinion of the owner or worker, to damage the further working of the mine, it should be lawful for the company to treat and agree with the owner or worker, and that, in case of disagreement, a jury should be summoned to assess the amount which the owner or worker ought to receive on being restrained from working the mine, and on payment of such amount he should be perpetually restrained from so working within limits to be specified by the jury. The defendants gave notice to the company of their intention to work coal which formed the support of the canal, but the defendants refused to pay compensation. The defendants worked the coal and damaged the canal.

Held, that the defendants had a right to have the compensation assessed by a jury, but not to work the coal to the injury of the canal, and that they were responsible for the damage to the canal.—Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. v. Knowles, C.A.—20 Q. B. D. 391; 57 L. J. Q. B. 150.

MISREPRESENTATION:—

1. Company—Prospectus — Directors—Damages.—An action for damages for deceit will lie against a person who makes an untrue statement as to a fact without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true when the statement is made with a view to its being acted upon by others.

The expression "fraud" considered and explained.

Edgington v. Fitzmaurice, 33 W. R. 911, 29 Ch. D. 459, and Weir v. Bell, 26 W. R. 746, 3 Ex. D. 238, considered.

A tramway company, by its special Act, was authorised, with the consent of the Board of Trade, to use steam or any other mechanical motive power instead of horse power. The directors of the company issued a prospectus which contained a statement that the company, by its special Act, "has the right to use steam or mechanical motive power instead of horses." The plaintiff took shares on the faith of the statement in the prospectus. The Board of Trade refused their consent to the use of steam power, and the company was wound up.

Held (reversing the decision of Stirling, J.), that the directors were liable to the plaintiff in damages in an action of deceit, on the ground that the statement in the prospectus was made without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true.

Held, also, that the measure of damages was the difference between the price which the plaintiff paid for the shares and the real value of the shares—as distinguished from their market value—at the time of their allotment to the plaintiff.—Peek v. Derry, C.A. 889—37 Ch. D. 541; 57 L. J. Ch. 347; 59 L. T. 78.

2. Company—Prospectus—Omission of contract—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.—Before the issue of the prospectus of the S. Co., the defendant S. verbally agreed with E. that, out of £21,000 represented in the prospectus to be the cash portion of the purchase-money, E. should receive £6,000 as promoter. This agreement did not appear on the prospectus. The plaintiff stated that if he had known of the agreement he would not have recommended the shares in the company to the plaintiffs C. & Co.

Held, (1) that there was such a misrepresentation as to entitle the plaintiff to relief; (2) that the agreement, though not in writing, was within section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and that its non-disclosure in the prospectus rendered such prospectus fraudulent; (3) that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.—Cupel v. Sim's Composition Co., CH.D. KEK., J. 689—57 L. J. Ch. 713; 58 L. T. 807.

3. Partnership—Rescission of contract—Indemnity.—A. was induced by misrepresentations made without fraud to become a partner in a business which was in fact insolvent. The firm afterwards became bankrupt.

Held, that A. was entitled to rescission of the contract and repayment of his capital.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 597, 34 Ch. D. 582) affirmed.

MISTAKE.—See WILL, 63.

MORTGAGE:—

1. Account—Interest—Mortgagee in possession—Lease—Licensed house—Sale of beer.—A leasehold public-house was mortgaged to brewers who entered into possession, and, after carrying on the business for some time, leased the public-house to tenants, with agreements binding the tenants to take their beer from them, under which they derived a large profit from the sale of beer. They afterwards sold the public-house under the power of sale in the mortgage.

Held, in an action by the mortgagor for an account, that the mortgagees were not entitled to interest on the cost of beer supplied while they were carrying on the business; that they were not bound to account for the profits derived from the sale of beer to the tenants of the public-house; but that they were chargeable with the increased rent they might have obtained if the tenants had been under no restrictions as to purchasing their beer.—White v. City of London Brewery Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 881.

2. After-acquired property—Consideration—Divisible contract.—A mortgagor assigned by way of mortgage (inter alia) property not then in existence, comprising "all moneys . . . to which the mortgagor . . . may, during this security, become entitled under any settlement, will, or other document, either in his own right or as next of kin of . . . any . . . person or persons," and "also all . . . personal property . . . of, to, or in which the mortgagor, . . . during this security, shall become beneficially possessed, entitled, or interested for any vested, contingent, or possible estate or interest." After the execution of the mortgage, but during the continuance of the security, the mortgagor became entitled to a share in a residuary estate.

Held, that, with regard to all property non-existent at the date of the mortgage, the mortgage was to be be treated in equity as a contract for valuable consideration received; that the contract was divisible in its terms; that, with respect to moneys to which the mortgagor might become entitled under any will, the contract would be enforced in equity; and that the share in the testator's residuary estate to which the mortgagor had become entitled was bound by the contract and was effectually charged in favour of the mortgagee.

Per Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ.—No distinction can be drawn on the question of "vagueness" between contracts in marriage settlements and contracts in other instruments relating to future property.

3. Attornment clause—Distress—Bankruptcy—Payment to trustee—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 6.—An indenture of mortgage contained a clause whereby the mortgagor attorned and became tenant from quarter to quarter to the mortgagee in respect of the premises at a yearly rent, by equal quarterly payments of £2,000. The consideration for the mortgage was an advance of £20,000, on which interest at £5 per cent. per annum was to be made payable. By the terms of the mortgage deed the first payment of the above rent was to be made on the first day of the month next after any interest thereby secured should have become in arrear, but all money received by the mortgagee for rent due under the attornment was to be accepted in the first place in or towards satisfaction of the interest then in arrear. A bankruptcy petition was subsequently presented against the mortgagor, upon which he was adjudicated bankrupt, but between such petition and adjudication the mortgagee distrained under the tenancy created by the attornment, and realised the sum of £1,715. The mortgage was not registered as a bill of sale.

Held (Lord Esher, M.R., dubitante), that the attornment clause fell within the first part of section 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and not within the proviso in that section, which is limited to cases where possession by the mortgagee precedes the demise; that, the mortgage not being registered, the distress was unlawful; and that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to the money realised.

Decision of Cave, J. (36 W. R. 639), affirmed.—Ex parte Kennedy, In re Willis, C.A. 793.

4. Contingent interest—Fund in court—Stop order—Petition—Service.—Where a contingent interest in a fund in court has been mortgaged and the mortgagee places a stop order on the fund, but the mortgagor dies before his interest vests, the persons ultimately entitled to the fund, upon applying for payment out, need not serve such mortgagee.—Vernon v. Croft, CH.D. CHI., J. 778—58 L. T. 919.

5. Equitable mortgage — Specific performance — Covenant—Statute of Limitations—Acknowledgment.—In 1874 a document not under seal recited that the defendant had deposited title deeds with the plaintiff by way of equitable mortgage to secure £6,000 without interest, and the defendant agreed to pay on demand £6,000, with interest, and to execute a proper mortgage. No interest was ever paid, and in 1885 an action was brought for specific performance of the agreement, and the court declared that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien on the deeds, and to have the agreement specifically performed, without prejudice to the defendant's right to account or the Statute of Limitations. While the action was pending the defendant wrote letters to the plaintiff in which he admitted a liability to account.

Held, that, the defendant's letters having taken the case out of the Statute of Limitations, the plaintiff was entitled to have a covenant to pay the principal and interest inserted in the mortgage deed.—Firth v. Slingsby, CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. T. 481.

6. Fixtures—Sub-demise—Trade fixtures.—Words which are sufficient when used in a conveyance in fee to pass trade fixtures are also sufficient to pass them when used in a demise.

By a mortgage by sub-demise, a corn mill and other leasehold premises, together with certain fixtures specifically mentioned, and constituting the motive power of the mill, were conveyed by sub-demise to the mortgagees, to secure a sum due to them by the mortgagors. The deed contained the following general words:—"Together with all buildings, fixtures, rights, lights, easements," &c.

Held, that the word "fixtures" in the general words was not restricted to fixtures ejusdem generis with those previously specifically mentioned, but was intended to extend and enlarge that class; and that the trade fixtures in the mill passed by the sub-demise to the mortgagees.

Decision of Bristowe, V.C., reversed.—Southport and West Lancashire Banking Co. v. Thompson, C.A. 113—37 Ch. D. 64; 57 L. J. Ch. 114.

7. Foreclosure action—Judgment—Foreclosure nisi Foreclosure absolute—Ord. 18, r. 2—Ord. 55, r. 5a.—In a foreclosure action commenced by originating summons, an order for foreclosure absolute may, as against the mortgagor in possession, served and not appearing, include an order for delivery of possession, notwithstanding that such an order was not claimed by the summons.—Best v. Applegate, CH.D. NOR., J. 397—37 Ch. D. 42; 57 L. J. Ch. 506; 57 L. T. 599.

8. Foreclosure action— Parties— Glebe— Vicar—Patron.—The vicar of a parish mortgaged part of his glebe under the powers of a statute giving owners of limited interests in land power to charge the costs of certain improvements on the land. The mortgagee brought an action for payment, or foreclosure, or sale.

Held, that the patron, having no interest in the soil, but only in the right of appointment to the cure of souls, need not be joined as a party to the action.—Goodden v. Coles, CH.D. KEK., J. 828.

9. Foreclosure action—Receiver—Foreclosure absolute.—Judgment for foreclosure absolute ends a foreclosure action, and therefore the plaintiff cannot obtain a receiver, even though the conveyance of the property has not been settled.—Wills v. Luff, CH.D. CHI., J. 571—38 Ch. D. 197; 57 L. J. Ch. 563.

10. Foreclosure action — Receiver — Goodwill — Form of order.—Where the property subject to a mortgage included the goodwill of a business, and a receiver and manager had been appointed after the commencement of a foreclosure action, the court inserted in the order of foreclosure a proviso that any person redeeming, or, in the event of foreclosure, the plaintiff, should be at liberty to apply to the judge in chambers for payment of any money in court or in the hands of the receiver.

11. Land Improvement Act—Charge—Priority.—By an Act of Parliament passed in 1849 the General Land Drainage and Improvement Co. was incorporated for the purpose of executing works for the improvement of lands, and undertaking and assisting the execution of such improvements, and other purposes. By an Act of Parliament passed in 1853 the Lands Improvement Co. was incorporated, and, by subsequent Acts of 1855 and 1859, the Act of 1853 was amended; and by the Act of 1859 it was enacted that the three Acts should be read together as one Act, and cited together as the Lands Improvement Co.'s Acts. Both the Act of 1849 and the Lands

Improvement Co.'s Acts contained a section which provided that, upon the final order or certificate of the Inclosure Commissioners and the execution of the improvements, the company should have a first charge upon the inheritance of the improved lands in priority over every other then existing or future charge. The General Land Drainage and Improvement Co. obtained a first charge of the nature above mentioned upon certain lands, and the Lands Improvement Co. subsequently obtained a charge over the same lands.

Held, that the respective enactments were not irreconcilable, and that the charge which was first in order of time had priority.—Pollock v. Lands Improvement Co., CH.D. CHI., J. 617—37 Ch. D. 661; 58 L. T. 374.

12. Lease—Rent—Notice to lessor.—Where a tenant holding under a lease, granted by the mortgagor subsequent to the mortgage, pays to the mortgagee the amount due for rent under threat of legal proceedings and in consequence of the default of his lessor, the tenant can set up such payment in answer to a claim for the rent by the mortgagor, or by anyone claiming under him.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 36 W. R. 75, 20 Q. B. D. 209) affirmed.—Underhay v. Read, C.A. 298—57 L. J. Q. B. 129; 58 L. T. 457.

13. Life insurance policy—Premium—Commission to solicitor.—The plaintiff mortgaged a life interest to the defendants, it being agreed that a policy on her life should be effected, and all premiums secured on the mortgaged property. A., as solicitor for all parties, paid the premiums, and received five per cent. commission from the insurance company.

Held, that the mortgagor had no interest in the premiums, and was not entitled to credit for the commission paid to A.—Leete v. Wallace, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 577.

14. Power of sale—Notice—Waiver.—A mortgage dated the 22nd of November, 1880, contained a covenant by the mortgagor to repay the principal money and interest on the 22nd of May, 1881, and contained a clause giving the mortgagee power to sell at any time after the expiration of six months from the date of the mortgage, but the clause was followed by a proviso restricting the exercise of the power of sale by the mortgagee, "unless and until default shall have been made in payment at the time hereinbefore appointed for payment thereof of some principal money or interest, . . . and" the mortgagee "shall have given a notice in writing" to the mortgagor "to pay off the moneys for the time being owing . . . and default shall have been made in the payment of . . . such moneys for three calendar months from the time of giving . . . such notice." The mortgage also contained the usual clause for the protection of purchasers on any sale by the mortgagee purporting to be made in pursuance of the power. In January, 1881, the mortgagee gave notice in writing to the mortgagor requiring payment of the principal moneys. In June, 1881, the principal moneys being unpaid, the mortgagee sold the mortgaged premises, in professed exercise of his power of sale, to a purchaser for value.

Held, affirming the decision of Kay, J., in an action instituted in March, 1885, by the executrix of the mortgagor, that the sale should be set aside, and should stand only as a transfer of the mortgage, on the ground that the power of sale had not arisen in June, 1881, and could not arise until at least nine months from the date of the mortgage.

Held, also, on the evidence, that neither the mortgagor nor the plaintiff, his executrix, had waived the benefit of the proviso restricting the exercise of the power of sale.

Observations on the effect of the clause protecting purchasers with reference to waiver by the mortgagor of the restrictive proviso.—Selwyn v. Garfit, C.A. 515—38 Ch. D. 373; 57 L. J. Ch. 609.

15. Redemption—Account—Interest—Mortgagee in possession—Costs.—In an action by persons claiming to represent an original mortgagor for redemption of the mortgaged property, the mortgagees having been in possession for many years, the judgment at the trial directed the taking of the ordinary accounts in a redemption action against mortgagees in possession, including an account of what was due to the defendants for principal and interest and their taxed costs of the action; and that, on payment by the plaintiffs within six months after the certificate of the balance, if any, which should be found due to the defendants, the defendants should reconvey the mortgaged property to the plaintiffs, and that, in default of payment, the action should be dismissed, with costs; but, in case it should appear, on taking the accounts, that the defendants had been overpaid, the further consideration of the action was to be adjourned. The chief clerk found by his certificate that the mortgage debt had been paid off in 1866 by means of rents which the defendants had received, and that there was a sum of £618 due from them in respect of rents which they had since received. The defendants had, by their statement of defence, denied the title of the plaintiffs to redeem, and had pleaded the Statute of Limitations. They had also insisted that a large balance was due to them. At the trial of the action the plaintiffs' title to redeem was not disputed, and the defence of the Statute of Limitations was overruled.

Held, that the account must be taken against the defendants with annual rests from the date at which the mortgage debt was fully paid.

Held, also, that the defendants must pay the costs of the action.—Ashworth v. Lord, CH.D. NOR., J. 446—36 Ch. D. 545; 57 L. J. Ch. 230; 58 L. T. 18.

16. Redemption—Tenant for years—Agreement for lease.—A tenant for years under an agreement for a lease made after a mortgage of the demised property is entitled to redeem the mortgage, whether the tenancy is beneficial or not.—Tarn v. Turner, CH.D. KEK., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 452; 58 L. T. 558.

17. Redemption—Reconveyance—Account—Particulars.—In an action by a mortgagor for reconveyance or redemption of the mortgaged property, the defendant by his counter-claim alleged that a certain specified sum was due to him, partly secured on bills of exchange accepted by the plaintiff and partly on open account, and that he had received divers sums in respect of the bills of exchange and other sums in respect of the moneys due on open account, but that a large balance was due to him; and he claimed an account and foreclosure or sale.

Held, on a summons by the mortgagor, that he was entitled to particulars from the defendant of the sums admitted to have been received by him in respect of the bills of exchange and the moneys due on open account.—Kemp v. Goldberg, CH.D. NOR., J. 278—36 36 Ch. D. 505; 56 L. T. 736.

18. Release—Gift—Parol release—Consideration.—Two brothers were, subject to their mother's life interest, entitled to a fund in equal moieties. One of them mortgaged his share to his father, who died, having appointed the other brother his executor and residuary legatee. The latter, on the death of his mother, wrote to his brother, the mortgagor, that, in accordance with her wish that he should hand over to him the mortgage deed, he gave himself the satisfaction of fulfilling her desire, and he inclosed the deed accordingly. Afterwards he insisted on his rights under the mortgage.

Held, that the gift, being by parol and without consideration, was imperfect, although accompanied by delivery of the deed, and could not be enforced by the mortgagor.

NEGLIGENCE:—

1. Contributory negligence.—The plaintiff was directed by his employer to work in a particular place, which was below a place where the defendants were engaged as contractors, their work being, in the absence of proper precautions, dangerous to persons working below. The plaintiff knew the danger. He was injured by a piece of iron dropped by one of the defendants' workmen. The jury found that the defendants were guilty of contributory negligence, that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that therefore he did not voluntarily incur the risk.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages.—Thrussell v. Handyside, Q.B.D.—20 Q. B. D 359; 57 L. J. Q. B. 347; 58 L. T. 344.

2. Contributory negligence — Evidence.—In an action for personal injuries caused by negligence, where the injured person has voluntarily contributed to such injuries the case ought not to be left to the jury unless the question whether his act was negligent was, either per se or in connection with the conduct of the defendants, a question of fact, or unless there is a reasonable inference that the defendants could by due care have obviated the consequences of the contributory negligence.—Coyle v. Great Northern Railway Co. of Ireland, EX.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 409.

3. Duty—Licensee.—The defendant's horse, by the negligence of the defendant's servant, ran away with a cart, and turned from a highway into the yard of the defendant's house, which opened on to the highway. The plaintiff's wife, who was paying a visit at the defendant's house, ran into the yard to see what was the matter, and was knocked down by the horse and cart.

Held, that there was no duty on the part of the defendant to use ordinary care towards the plaintiff's wife, and that an action was not maintainable.—Telhausen v. Davies, Q.B.D. —57 L. J. Q. B. 392.

2. Crown lands—Forfeiture—Re-grant.—The defendant applied for a grant, partly on conditional purchase and partly on conditional lease of land, within the plaintiff's leasehold area. The land had been previously conditionally sold and forfeited by the purchaser.

Held, that the forfeited land could be re-granted by the Crown.—Tearle v. Edols, P.C.—13 App. 183; 57 L. J. P. C. 58; 58 L. T. 360.

3. Municipal corporation—Bye-law—Ultrà vires—Burial.—A bye-law framed under the New South Wales Municipalities Act, 1867, s. 153, which authorises regulation of interments within the municipality, is not ultrà vires in that it practically prohibits interments in a certain cemetery, and thus interferes with the private rights of owners of ground therein.

NUISANCE:—

1. River—Pollution—Joint tort-feasors.—If several riparian manufacturers have caused a nuisance to a riparian owner by polluting the water of a river, the fact that they are all responsible for the nuisance is no answer to an action against one of them.—Blair v. Deakin, CH. D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 522.

2. River — Pollution — Prescription — Change in manufacture—Land Drainage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 133), s. 58.—The appellants began business on certain premises as fellmongers in 1832, and in 1852 added the business of a tannery, discharging the refuse into a stream within the jurisdiction of the respondents. In 1877 the appellants set up a manufactory of leathern boards on the same premises, and discharged refuse of a different character through the old and also through additional outlets into the same stream. The respondents convicted and fined the appellants for pollution of the stream under powers conferred by a local Act, which followed the terms of section 58 of the Land Drainage Act in saving existing legal rights. The quarter sessions upheld the conviction.

Held, that the rights of the appellants must be determined at the time of the passing of the Land Drainage Act, 1861; that, if they had gained at that time any legal right by prescription (as to which, quære), it was only the right to discharge the refuse of the fellmongery business; that that right was being exceeded, whether or not the burden on the servient tenement had been increased; and that the conviction was right.—Clark v. Somersetshire Drainage Commissioners, Q.B.D. 890; 57 L. J. M. C. 96.

3. Small-pox hospital—Injunction.—The defendants fitted up a cottage as a small-pox hospital. The grounds in which the cottage stood were bounded by a public road on one side, open fields on two other sides, and the plaintiff's property on the fourth side. The evidence being conflicting, a medical referee was appointed, who reported that there was appreciable danger to persons dwelling in the plaintiffs' houses.

Held, that an injunction should be granted.—Bendelow v. Wortley Guardians, CH.D. STI., J. 168—57 L. J. Ch. 762; 57 L. T. 849.

NOR., J. 807.

2. Short cause—Title—Affidavit.—In an action for partition of real estate which was heard as a short cause, the court, being satisfied that all persons interested were parties to an action and desired a sale, allowed the title to be proved by affidavit.—Coombe v. Vincent, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 709.

PARTNERSHIP:—

1. Death of partner — Covenant — Enforcement against executors. — Partnership articles provided that the partnership should last for fifteen years, and that in case any partner should die during the partnership, his executors or administrators should become partners in respect of his share.

Held, that the court would not, on the death of a partner, force the executors to become partners against their will; and that, if they declined to come in, the partnership must be treated as dissolved from the death of the deceased partner, but the judgment must reserve to the surviving partners the right to prosecute against the estate of the deceased any remedy which they might have in respect of any breach of a covenant in the articles.—Lancaster v. Allsup, CH.D. STI, J.—57 L. T. 53.

2. Dissolution—Bill of exchange—Compromise of action.—The defendant was a partner in the firm of G. & Co. from January to June, 1885, and no notice was given to the plaintiff of his retirement. Between those dates the plaintiff discounted an acceptance indorsed by G. & Co., which was dishonoured. The plaintiff sued G. & Co. for the amount, and G. & Co. brought a cross-action against the plaintiff for recovery of the bill. Both actions were stayed by order of the court on G. & Co. giving to the plaintiff a second acceptance for the amount of the first and £10 for costs, and the plaintiff giving up certain securities for the debt which were in his possession. The second acceptance was dishonoured, and the plaintiff sued the defendant upon it as a member of the firm of G. & Co.

Held, that the defendant was not liable, as the bill of exchange was given in settlement of legal proceedings, and the settlement was made without his knowledge or consent.—Crane v. Lewis, Q.B.D. 480.

3. Dissolution—Capital—Profits—Lien.—Partners treated their respective shares of the profits declared or estimated in each year as accretions to their respective capitals.

Held, that, in the year in which the dissolution of the firm occurred, profits could not be so treated; and that the surplus assets must be distributed, first, in paying to each partner his claims in respect of capital; the residue or deficiency to be divisible in the proportions of the respective interests of the partners, and the distribution of surplus assets to be subject to the lien of any partner on the entire assets to satisfy a deficiency. —Binney v. Mutrie, P.C. 129—12 App. 160; 56 L. T. 455.

4. Dissolution — Receiver — Manager — Remuneration.—A receiver and manager appointed by partners to wind up their business is, in the absence of any express stipulation, entitled only to a quantum meruit. —Prior v. Bagster, CH.D. STI., J.—57 L. T. 760.

5. Profits — Loan — Mortgage.—In deciding the question of partnership or no partnership in cases of loans to persons engaged in business, the court will not base its decision on isolated clauses in the agreement, nor on such circumstances as participation in profits, but will look at the whole agreement; and, if it appears therefrom that the business was a joint business, each party being concerned as principal and as agent for the other, the agreement will be treated as constituting a partnership.

A loan was made to a person engaged in an undertaking at a rate of interest varying with the profits arising out of the undertaking, the amount of the loan and the interest being secured by a mortgage to the lender of the borrower's interest in the undertaking. The borrower became bankrupt.

Held (reversing the decision of Stirling, J., 35 W. R. 106, 34 Ch. D. 536), that, notwithstanding the participation in profits, no partnership was created between the lender and the borrower, but that the transaction was a bonâ fide loan.

PATENT:—

1. Disclaimer—Amendment of specification—Costs —Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 19.—While an action for infringement of several patents was pending, the court gave the plaintiffs leave to apply to the Commissioners of Patents to amend one of the patents by way of disclaimer, and to give the amended specification in evidence at the trial, the plaintiffs paying the costs of the action up to the date of the amendment, and waiving any claim to damages for infringement before the amendment.—Gaulard v. Lindsay, C.A.—38 Ch. D. 38; 57 L. J. Ch. 687; 59 L. T. 44.

2. Infringement — Cross-action — Specification — Amendment — Disclaimer — Prohibition — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 18, sub-section 10; s. 19.—An action for an injunction against threats of legal proceedings and a cross-action for infringement having been commenced between two parties in relation to a patent, the plaintiffs in the cross-action for infringement obtained leave from the judge before whom the action was entered to apply to the Comptroller-General to amend their specification by way of disclaimer, whereupon the plaintiffs in the first action for the injunction applied for a writ of prohibition against the hearing by the Comptroller of the application to disclaim, on the ground that legal proceedings in relation to the patent were pending under section 18, sub-section 10, of the Patents Act, 1883.

Held, that no prohibition would lie, and that, where liberty to apply to disclaim under section 19 of the Patents Act, 1883, had been given, the proceedings detailed in section 18 of that Act are available, notwithstanding that other legal proceedings in relation to the patent were pending.—In re Hall, Q.B.D. 22—21 Q. B. D. 337; 57 L. J. Q. B. 494; 59 L. T. 57.

2a. Infringement — Prior publication — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 51.—B. invented a trimming for corsets, which he showed to H., a commission agent employed by him on terms which gave H. an interest in the articles sold, to obtain his opinion as to whether the article would "take." H. showed the trimming to S., one of his largest customers, who suggested certain alterations; he also showed it to other customers, who ordered a certain quantity. This took place before the 23rd of November, 1885, when B. registered the article under the Act. The orders given were not executed until after registration.

Held, that, though there had not been previous publication of the design by showing the article to H., the communication of the design by H. to S. might amount—and the communication to the other customers did amount—to previous publication.

A trimming was made up into packets containing each a large numbers of yards, and surrounded with a paper band having thereon "Rd." and the registered number of the pattern.

Held, that the article was properly marked within rule 32.—Blank v. Footman, CH.D. KEK., J. 921.

3. Infringement—Specification—Objections—Particulars—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 29.—In an action for infringement of a patent for complicated machinery, where the specification contains numerous claims, the defendant's particulars of objection on the ground of prior publication must specify the particular articles alleged to be anticipations of the plaintiff's patent and the respective claims in the specifications which are alleged to have been anticipated, but they need not state the parts of the plaintiff's invention which are alleged to have been anticipated.—Boyd v. Farrar, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 866.

4. Revocation—Fraud—Mistake of agent—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 26, sub-sections 4, 8.—The owner of a foreign patent communicated the invention to a person whom he appointed his agent for the purpose of obtaining a patent for the invention in England, with power to the agent to appoint a substitute. The agent appointed a substitute, who applied for and obtained a patent for the invention in England in his own name as first and true inventor, and without disclosing the fact that the invention was communicated. The owner of the foreign patent presented a petition for revocation of the English patent under section 26, sub-section 4, of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, alleging that the English patent was obtained "in fraud of his rights." The substitute had not, either when applying for the patent or after he had obtained it, acted with the intention of depriving the principal of his rights.

Held, that the patent was not obtained in fraud of the rights of the petitioner, and that the petition should be dismissed.

Decision of Stirling, J. (35 W. R. 541), affirmed.—In re Avery's Patent, C.A. 249—36 Ch. D. 307; 56 L. J. Ch. 1007; 56 L. T. 324.

5. Revocation — Petition — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 26.—Any person having any qualification mentioned in section 26 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, may petition for revocation of a patent.—In re Morgan, CH.D. CHI., J.—58 L. T. 713.

6. Specification — Amendment—Disclaimer—Costs —Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 19.—The plaintiffs in an action for infringement of patent applied to the court for liberty to apply at the Patent Office for leave to amend their specification by way of disclaimer. The pleadings in the action had been completed, and they asked that the costs of such part thereof as might be used at the trial of the action might be reserved.

Held, that liberty ought to be granted upon the terms that the plaintiffs should pay the costs of the application and the costs of and occasioned by the amendment; that both plaintiffs and defendants should have leave to amend their pleadings; that the plaintiffs must undertake forthwith, after disclaimer, to amend their pleadings, confining the action to the amended specification, or to consent to the action being discontinued, with costs; and that, in the event of the action proceeding, all other questions of costs should be reserved.—Haslam Foundry and Engineering Co. v. Goodfellow, CH.D. KAY, J. 391—37 Ch. D. 118; 57 L. J. Ch. 245; 57 L. T. 788.

7. Specification—Chemical process.—Judgment of the Court of Appeal (29 Ch. D. 366) reversed, and judgment of Pearson, J. (24 Ch. D. 156), restored.—Badische Anilin Und Soda Fabrik v. Levinstein, H.L.—12 App. 710; 57 L. T. 853.

8. Specification — Combination — Infringement — Estoppel.—Where a patent has been obtained for an invention consisting of a combination of mechanical appliances, if the invention is new it is not necessary—on the question of validity of the patent—that the particular portions of the patent should or should not have been claimed as novel in the specification; but, on the question of infringement, where the infringement alleged is not the taking of the combination, but the taking of a subsidiary portion of the combination, it is necessary that the novelty of such portion should have been claimed.

Foxwell v. Bostock, 12 W. R. 723, 4 De G. J. & S. 298, explained.

Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co., 1 App. Cas. 574, 25 W. R. H. L. Dig. 174, followed.

Where the invention claimed by a patentee is one merely for improvements in a combination of the mechanical means already used in old machines, producing a result already well known, the patentee will be held strictly to the description given in his specification of the particular means by which his invention is carried into effect, and the doctrine that mere mechanical equivalents constitute an infringement does not apply; but where the invention claimed is one not merely for improvements in the combination of mechanical means employed, but also in the application of those means to produce a result that is novel, the user by another person of mere mechanical equivalents for the purpose of producing the same result constitutes an infringement of the patent.

Curtis v. Platt, 3 Ch. D. 135n, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 59, distinguished.

Clark v. Adie, 26 W. R. 45, 2 App. Cas. 315, explained.

The defendant in an action for infringement of a patent, in order to successfully plead—at the hearing of the action as distinguished from an interlocutory application—acquiescence as a bar to the plaintiff's rights, must prove (1) that the defendant was ignorant of the plaintiff's rights; (2) that the plaintiff knew of the defendant's ignorance, and stood by and allowed him to expend money in ignorance of those rights.—Proctor v. Bennis, C.A. 456—36 Ch. D. 470; 57 L. J. Ch. 11; 57 L. T. 622.

9. Threat of legal proceedings — Injunction — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 32. —The proviso contained in section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, will be satisfied if an action to test the validity of the patent or the fact of infringement is honestly brought with reasonable diligence against the person or persons to whom the threats have been made.

In considering whether such an action has been commenced with reasonable diligence, regard must be had to the time when the threats were first issued, and not to the time when the plaintiff first heard of the infringement.

In an action under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, to restrain the issue of threats, the plaintiff may put in issue the validity of the defendant's patent.

Kurtz v. Spence, 35 W. R. 26, 33 Ch. D. 579, disapproved.—Challender v. Royle, C.A. 357—36 Ch. D. 425; 57 L. J. Ch. 995; 57 L. T. 734.

10. Threat of legal proceedings — Injunction — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 32—Amendment—Ord. 28, r. 1.—In an action brought under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, to restrain threats, the plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, alleged that the defendants' patent was invalid. Chitty, J., on the application of the defendants, ordered the allegation to be struck out. A subsequent application to Kekewich, J., to whom the action had been transferred for trial, for leave to amend the statement of claim by restoring the allegation of the invalidity of the patent, was refused.

Held (Fry, L.J., dissenting), that the leave to amend ought to be given on terms which would prevent the defendants suffering any loss.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.—Kurtz v. Spence, C.A. 438—58 L. T. 438.

11. Threat of legal proceedings— Particulars— Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 32. —In an action to restrain threats of legal proceedings for infringements of patents, the plaintiffs alleged that the patents upon which the defendants relied in making threats were invalid. The defendants applied that the plaintiffs should give particulars of their objections to the patents.

Held (affirming the decision of North, J., 36 W. R. 263), that before the plaintiffs could be required to give such particulars the defendants should give to the plaintiffs a list of the patents on which, and on which only, the defendants relied, and that the plaintiffs should undertake to amend their statement of claim so as to put in issue the validity of those patents only.—Union Electrical Power and Light Co. v. Electrical Power Storage Co. C.A. 913—38 Ch. D. 325.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, 36 W. R. 478, 20 Q. B. D. 191) (Lopes, L.J., dissenting), that she must be deemed to be settled in that parish under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876.—Medway Guardians v. Bedminster Guardians, C.A. 851—21 Q. B. D. 278.

8. Settlement — Derivative settlement — Divided Parishes Act, 1876, s. 35.—By section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, "no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, . . . except in the case of a wife from her husband and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another."

Held, on an inquiry into the settlement of a pauper over the age of sixteen, that the pauper, not having acquired a settlement of its own, retained the settlement which it derived from its father when under the age of sixteen.

Reg. v. Islington Guardians, 15 Q. B. D. 95, 34 W. R. Dig. 135, overruled.—Dorchester Guardians v. Poplar Guardians, C.A. 706—21 Q. B. D. 88; 57 L. J. M. C. 78.

9. Settlement—Derivative settlement—"Widow"—Child under sixteen—Divided Parishes Act, 1876, s. 35.—A pauper under the age of sixteen, whose father was dead and whose mother had married again, having become chargeable to a parish in the respondent union, an order was made for her removal into the appellant union, in which was the birth settlement of the mother. Neither the father nor the mother had acquired any other settlement than that of their birth.

Held, that the pauper, at the time of adjudication, after her mother had married again, had no other settlement than that of her birth, which was in the respondent union, and that the order was wrong.—Amersham Guardians v. City of London Guardians, Q.B.D. 141—20 Q. B. D. 103; 57 L. J. M. C. 6; 58 L. T. 83.

10. Settlement—Emancipation—Divided Parishes Act, 1876, ss. 34, 35.—By section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein.

By section 35 no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another.

The pauper, E., who had always been physically incapable of work, was the legitimate daughter of C. and M., and was born in the appellant union, in which her father was settled, on the 27th of October, 1861. In 1862 she and her parents went to reside in the N. Union, where C. died in 1868. In 1871 her mother, M., married again. On the 27th of October, 1877, the pauper attained the age of sixteen, and on the 5th of June, 1880, she began to receive relief from the N. Union. In November, 1885, E., with her mother and stepfather, with whom she had always resided, moved into the respondent union, where, on the 21st of September, 1886, she became chargeable.

Held, that E. had not resided in the N. Union so as to acquire a settlement after she had attained the age of sixteen, and that she retained the settlement derived from her father, since her mother, on her second marriage, ceased to be a widowed mother, and that she was therefore settled in the appellant union.

Every child, on attaining the age of sixteen, and whether continuing a member of its father's family or not, and whether mentally or physically incapable or not, is, for the purposes of settlement, emancipated, and is capable of acquiring a settlement.

B. D. 749; 59 L. T. 103.

2. Appeal—Valuation list—Contribution to union—Parochial Assessment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 103), s. 32.—The guardians of a union received sums from the overseers of a township under precepts based upon the existing valuation list. It was subsequently decided, on an appeal by colliery owners representing two-thirds of the township, that the valuation list was too high. The overseers did not appeal against the valuation list under section 32 of the Parochial Assessment Act, 1862, but having refunded the amount overpaid by the colliery owners, claimed credit for the excess paid to the guardians.

Held, that the guardians might give credit for the sums overpaid by the overseers, though the latter had not appealed against the valuation list; and that justices might refuse to enforce by distress warrant the precept for a general rate based on the old valuation list when it appeared that such sums had already been paid in excess by the overseers.—Tynemouth Guardians v. Backworth Overseers, Q.B.D.—57 L. J. M. C. 53.

3. Distress warrant—Discretion of justices.—On a summons before justices to enforce a poor rate against a railway company, it appeared that property occupied by the company had been assessed as "offices and land with rails," but that, in estimating the amount of the rate, the overseers had treated certain buildings as being occupied by the company which were not in fact occupied by them. The company had not appealed against the rule.

Held, that the justices were bound to issue a distress warrant.—Manchester Overseers v. Headlam, Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 96; L. J. M. C. 89.

POWER of APPOINTMENT:—

1. Default—Delegation——Ultimate limitation.—The donee of a power of appointment among his own children appointed to his son for life, with remainder to his son's children as he should appoint, and in default of such appointment to the son absolutely. The son died without having exercised the power of appointment delegated to him.

Held, that the ultimate limitation to the son was valid and took effect.—Williamson v. Farwell, CH.D. NOR., J., 37—35 Ch. D. 128; 56 L. J. Ch. 645; 56 L. T. 824.

2. Husband and wife—Jointure—Escrow—Corrupt bargain.—W. had, under his father's will, a power of appointment to the extent of £200 per annum for the purpose of jointuring his wife. An arrangement was come to between W. and his wife, from whom he was living apart, in pursuance of which W. was to execute an appointment to that amount in favour of his wife, who was thereupon to assign £60 per annum, part of the appointed sum, to T., with whom W. was living. The deed of appointment was executed, but the wife refused to execute the assignment of the £60 to T.

Held, in an action by the wife claiming a declaration that the power of appointment was validly exercised to the extent of £140, that the appointment would never have been made at all except for effectuating an unauthorised purpose, and that the action must be dismissed.

Held, also, that the appointment in favour of the wife was an escrow, being intended, to the knowledge of the husband and wife, only to take effect on condition of the wife assigning a portion of the jointure-moneys to a third party not an object of the power.

The statement of the law in Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 712, disapproved, but followed.—Whelan v. Palmer, CH.D. KEK., J. 587—57 L. J. Ch. 787.

3. Settlement—After-acquired property—Covenant to settle.—A marriage settlement contained a covenant that if the wife, or the husband in her right, should at the same time and from the same source become entitled to real or personal property of the value of £500 or upwards, the same should be vested in the trustees of the settlement, to be held on the same trusts as the property assigned to them by the wife. The wife's father afterwards bequeathed £4,000 to the trustees of the settlement upon trust for such persons and for such purposes as the wife should appoint in writing, and, in default of or subject to any such appointment, in trust for her separate use, and the will declared the testator's intention that the wife should be able to defeat the covenant to settle after-acquired property by exercising her power of appointment. The wife, by nine separate appointments of sums under £500, appointed the £4,000 to be held in trust for her separate use.

Held, that the appointment was valid.—Oliphant v. Gerard, CH.D. NOR., J.—58 L. T. 800.

4. Special occupancy—Devolution of title—Annuity. By deed executed in 1820 S., in consideration of the marriage of his son M., and to provide an annuity of £400 for M. and maintenance for his intended wife and the issue of the marriage, conveyed land held on leases renewable for ever to trustees, their heirs and assigns, on trust to pay to M. an annuity of £400 for life, and after his death to pay £100 to his wife, if surviving, and as to the residue of the annuity and the said £100, after the wife's death in trust for the children of the marriage in such shares as M. should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for all the children equally, if more than one, or their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and after the death of M. without issue or the death of all his issue under age, then on trust for the sole use and benefit of S., his heirs, executors, and administrators. There was a power of entry and distress to M. and his intended wife for recovery of arrears of the annuity. In 1869 M., by deed of appointment, after reciting his desire to appoint the annuity created by the settlement among his surviving children, and in exercise of his power, appointed £50 a year to his daughter, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and that the residue of the annuity should be limited to the uses of others of his children, their executors, administrators, and assigns, as tenants in common.

Held, that the deed of 1869 did not alter the special occupancy, but that on the death of an appointee his share devolved on his heir-at-law.—Whitehead v. Morton, V.C. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 435.

5. Will—Contrary intention—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26) s. 27.—By a settlement made by M. on his marriage property was vested in trustees, upon such trusts for the benefit of the children of the marriage, or for the benefit of any other person or persons, as M. should by will "expressly referring to this power, or the subject thereof," appoint; and in default of appointment on trusts for the children of the marriage, and M., by his will (which did not refer to the power), gave the residue of his estate to trustees, on trusts for his daughter and her children.

Held, that as no "contrary intention" appeared by the will, the residuary gift was a good execution of the general power contained in the settlement.—Mason v. Thorne, CH.D. NOR., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 639.

6. Will—Revocation—Wills Act, 1837, s. 27.—Under a marriage settlement £1,000 was settled upon trust for such persons as G. should by will or codicil, or any writing in the nature thereof, appoint. G. executed a document which he called a testamentary appointment, and thereby, in pursuance of his power of appointment under the settlement, he appointed the £1,000, subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, whether of his testamentary appointment or of any will or codicil affecting his general property, unto his four sons. G. afterwards by will, after making various specific bequests to his four sons and three daughters, gave, devised, and bequeathed all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever unto all his children equally. Probate was granted of the will, but not of the testamentary appointment.

Held, that, by the 27th section of the Wills Act, 1837, the gift in the will operated as a revocation of the prior testamentary appointment, and as an execution of the power of appointment given by the marriage settlement.—White v. Randolph, CH.D. NOR., J. 429—37 Ch. D. 413; 57 L. J. Ch. 734; 58 L. T. 11.

He established one objection, but failed to establish the others. The judge gave judgment for the defendant, and, upon the application of the plaintiff, granted a certificate, that the validity of the patent came in question, under section 31 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

Held, upon appeal by the defendant from the decision granting the certificate, that no appeal lay, as the decision was not a "judgment or order" within section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873.—Haslam Foundry and Engineering Co. v. Hall (2), C.A. 407—20 Q. B. D. 491; 57 L. J. Q. B. 352.

7. Pauper proceeding—Crown side—Ord. 19, r. 22—Ord. 68, rr. 1, 2.—In proceedings on the Crown side in the Queen's Bench Division there is no power to admit a person to sue or defend in formâ pauperis.—Mulleneisen v. Coulson (2), Q.B.D. 811—21 Q. B. D. 3; 57 L. J. Q. B. 464.

8. Pauper proceeding—House of Lords—Pauper appeal—Fishery—Public right.—Leave will not be granted to prosecute an appeal to the House of Lords in formâ pauperis where the appellant seeks as one of the public to establish a right of fishing in a tidal river, the appellant having been assisted in the litigation by subscriptions.—Bowie v. Marquis of Ailsa, H.L.—13 App. 371.

9. Postponement—Sufficient reason.—An application to postpone the hearing of an appeal which is in the general list, though made with the consent of all parties, will not be granted as a matter of course. The court requires some sufficient reason for the postponement to be shown. The fact that negotiations with a view to settlement of the appeal are pending is such sufficient reason.—Bird v. Andrew, C.A. 1.

10. Shorthand notes—Ord. 58, r. 11.—When any question of fact is involved in an appeal the evidence as to which has been given orally in the court below, it is the duty of the appellant to apply to one of the judges of the Court of Appeal, through his clerk, to ask the judge from whom the appeal comes to send a copy of his notes to the Court of Appeal. If the appellant has not so applied, the appeal will be ordered to stand over at the appellant's expense.

Shorthand notes of evidence in the court below, taken by an independent professional shorthand writer, may be referred to on the hearing of an appeal, but the Court of Appeal will not allow shorthand notes of evidence taken by a clerk of one of the solicitors in the action to be in any way referred to.—Ellington v. Clark, C.A. 873—38 Ch. D. 332; 58 L. T. 818.

11. Stannaries Court—Deposit—Stannaries Act,

1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 19), s. 32—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 18, sub-section 3—Ord. 58, r. 15.—The provision in section 32 of the Stannaries Act, 1869, requiring a deposit of £20 to be made with the registrar of the Stannaries Court on appeals from the Vice-Warden, is not abrogated by the Judicature Acts or by any of the rules thereunder, and is still in force.

An undertaking not to appeal given after the delivery of judgment on the matter at issue, but before the judge had decided the question of costs, by counsel on behalf of an unsuccessful litigant, on condition of his client not being required to pay the costs of the successful litigant, is within the implied authority of counsel, and cannot be withdrawn in the absence of misapprehension or surprise inducing the undertaking.

An appeal once set down cannot be withdrawn by the appellant on merely obtaining the written consent thereto of the respondent, but an application to the court for leave to withdraw the appeal is necessary.—In re West Devon Great Consols Mine Co., C.A. 342—38 Ch. D. 51; 57 L. J. Ch. 850.

12. Time—Extension—Company—Winding up—Director.—A., B., C., D., E., and F. were directors of a company. A., B., and C. retired, after selling their shares to the company and receiving payment out of the company's funds. The company was wound up, and an order was made on all the six directors to replace the money paid to A., B., and C., with liberty to D., E., and F. to apply as to the liability of A., B., and C. On the last day for appealing A., B., and C. appealed against the order without the knowledge of D., E., and F.

The court gave leave to D., E., and F. to appeal after time.—In re Clayton Mills Manufacturing Co., C.A.—37 Ch. D. 28; 57 L. J. Ch. 325; 58 L. T. 317.

CHARGING ORDER—

13. Fund in court—Ord. 46, rr. 1, 3—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, sub-section 7.—Under ord. 46, rr. 1, 3, a charging order may be made on cash standing to the credit of the judgment debtor in the name of the Paymaster-General.—Brereton v. Edwards, Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 226.

COMPROMISE—

14. Authority of counsel.—It is within the general authority of counsel conducting a cause in court to consent to a compromise upon terms, unless the client has withdrawn his authority to the knowledge of the opposite party.—Matthews v. Munster, C.A. 178—20 Q. B. D. 141; 57 L. J. Q. B. 49; 57 L. T. 922.

PARTIES—

15. Adding defendant—Ex parte application—Ord. 16, r. 11.—An application to add a defendant to an action must not be made ex parte.—Hall v. Colbeck, CH.D. KAY, J. 259.

16. Adding defendant—Partnership—Ord. 16, r. 11.—In an action for a partnership debt the defendant has a right, under ord. 16, r. 11, to add as defendant a person who is jointly liable with himself for the money claimed, although the plaintiff objects to the addition.

Kendal v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504, followed.—Pilley v. Robinson, Q.B.D. 269—20 Q. B. D. 155; 57 L. J. Q. B. 54; 58 L. T. 110.

17. Adding plaintiff—Consent in writing—Trustee—Ord. 16, rr. 2, 11—The rule that no person shall be added as a plaintiff without his consent in writing does not admit of an exception where the plaintiffs in an action seek to add as a co-plaintiff a person who is a trustee for the plaintiffs.—Besley v. Besley, CH.D. CHI., J. 604—37 Ch. D. 648; 57 L. J. Ch. 464; 58 L. T. 510.

18. Partition action—Lunacy—Next friend—Partition Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 40), ss. 3, 4—Partition Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 17), s. 6.—A partition action may be brought by a person of unsound mind not so found by a next friend.

An action for sale under the Partition Acts having been brought by two tenants in common, one of whom, stated to be of weak mind, sued by the other as his next friend, the court held that an action in that form, being primâ facie for his benefit, could be maintained, and refused to strike out his name as co-plaintiff.

Semble, a request for sale at the trial by a next friend on behalf of a person of unsound mind not so found, assuming that such a request can be effectually made, cannot be acted upon in the same way as a request by a person not under disability, nor unless the court is satisfied that the sale is for his benefit.—Porter v. Porter, C.A. 580—37 Ch. D. 420.

19. Third party—Indemnity.—In an action against a railway company, the relief claimed by the plaintiffs was that sums of stock of a specified amount might be transferred into the names of the plaintiffs in the company's register, the plaintiffs alleging that stock to that amount had been improperly transferred out of their names by the defendant company in consequence of a forged authority to transfer. The railway company were alone made defendants. The defendant company obtained leave to issue a third party notice claiming indemnity against persons who were transferees of part of the stock, and that order was not appealed from. On a summons for directions by the defendant company—the third parties refusing to admit any liability to contribution or indemnity—Kay, J., made an order that the third parties should be at liberty to attend at the trial of the action and take such part therein as the judge might direct, and that they should be bound by the trial, but refused to allow them to deliver a defence.

Held, on appeal by the third parties, that the order was right, on the grounds (1) that, though the defendant company were willing to have the third parties added as defendants, yet, having regard to the nature of the relief claimed by the action, the plaintiffs were entitled to object to the third parties being added as defendants; (2) that, having regard to the fact that the defendant company had, by their defence, raised every point that could be suggested by the third parties, no injustice had been done to the third parties by the refusal to allow them to deliver a defence.

20. Third party—Marine insurance—Suing and labouring clause—Indemnity—Ord. 16, r. 48.—The usual suing and labouring clause in a policy of marine insurance does not amount to a contract by the underwriters to indemnify the shipowner in respect of contracts made by him for the purpose of attempting to save the ship, and therefore, where an action brought is against the shipowner for work done under such a contract, the defendant is not entitled to bring in the underwriters as third parties under ord. 16, r. 48.—Johnston v. Salvage Association, C.A. 56—19 Q. B. D. 458; 57 L. T. 218.

PLEADING.

21. Amendment—Re-service—Specific performance—Ord. 27, r. 11.—In the statement of claim in an action for specific performance the plaintiff craved leave to refer to the agreement, and spoke of the property agreed to be sold as "described in the schedule to the said agreement." The defendant delivered no statement of defence. The plaintiff moved for judgment in default of pleadings.

Held, that the description of the property was insufficient; that the court could not look at any evidence beyond the pleadings; and that the statement of claim must be amended and served again.—Smith v. Buchan, CH.D. KAY, J. 631.

22. Amendment without leave—Waiver—Ord. 18, r. 2—Ord. 70, r. 2.—A claim to recover possession of land was, after the institution of an action for administration, added by amending the statement of claim, and without the leave of the court being obtained under ord. 18, r. 2. The defendant pleaded to the amended statement of claim, and raised the objection to the joinder of causes of action without leave, but took no step to insist on the objection until the trial of the action.

Held, that the objection to the joinder of the claims could not be insisted on at the trial, as it would be too late under ord. 70, r. 2.—Derbon v. Collis, CH.D. KEK., J. 667—58 L. T. 519.

23. Counter-claim—Defendants to counter-claim—Default of appearance—Judgment—Ord. 27, rr. 1, 2—Ord. 32, r. 6.—Several persons as plaintiffs brought an action against a defendant, T., to restrain him from infringing certain commonable rights over a piece of waste land. T. counter-claimed against the plaintiffs and seven other persons not originally parties to the action for an injunction to restrain them from erecting fences on part of the waste land. The seven persons so joined did not enter an appearance, and judgment against them on the counter-claim in default of appearance was moved for by the defendant in the action.

Held, that the cause of action against the seven persons was not severable within the meaning of ord. 27, r. 12, but came within ord. 32, r. 6, and that the case was not one in which immediate judgment would be granted against the defendants to the counter-claim who had not appeared.—Verney v. Thomas, CH.D. KEK., J. 398—58 L. T. 20.

24. Default—Admiralty action—Damages—Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), s. 1—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 11.—In an action to recover damages for loss of life under Lord Campbell's Act under section 11 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the court—there having been default in pleading—pronounced interlocutory judgment, and ordered the damages proceeded for to be assessed on a writ of inquiry directed to the sheriff of Middlesex.—The Orwell, P.D. & A.D. 703—12 P. D. 80; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 61.

25. Default—Counter-claim—Judgment—Ord. 27, r. 11.—In an action for goods sold and delivered there was a counter-claim for damages for wrongfully issuing an execution. The plaintiff filed no reply, and the action was dismissed for want of prosecution.

Held, that judgment on the counter-claim could be signed only on motion for judgment under ord. 27, r. 11.—Higgins v. Scott, Q.B.D.—21 Q. B. D. 10; 58 L. T. 383.

26. Default—Judgment—Action in rem—Ord. 13, r. 12.—In an action in rem for necessaries the defendant did not appear. The writ, though not specially indorsed, contained particulars of the plaintiff's claim.

The court gave judgment for the plaintiff without delivery of a statement of claim.—The Hulda, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. T. 29.

27. Default—Married woman—Judgment—Separate estate—Ord. 27, r. 11.—Where a married woman is the defendant to an action on a contract, and has made default in the delivery of a defence, the plaintiff's statement of claim must contain an allegation that the defendant has separate estate; otherwise the court will refuse to make an order against the defendant on the statement of claim under ord. 27, r. 11.—Tetley v. Griffith, CH.D. CHL., J. 96—57 L. T. 673.

28. Further statement—New matter—Confession—Costs—Ord. 24, rr. 2, 3.—In an action for an injunction, the defendants, after delivering their statement of defence, delivered a further defence, setting forth a ground of defence arising after the delivery of their statement of defence. The plaintiffs thereupon delivered a confession of the further defence, and signed judgment for costs up to the time of the defendants pleading the further defence. The defendants did not intend, by pleading the further defence, to waive their first defence, which, they alleged, included the point raised by their further defence.

Held, on motion by the defendants to set aside the judgment for costs, that, the defendants consenting that their further defence be struck out, the judgment for costs should be discharged.—Bridgetown Waterworks Co. v. Barbadoes Water Supply Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 853—38 Ch. D. 378.

29. Particulars—Discovery—Ord. 19, r. 17.—In an action by the executors of a deceased married woman against her husband claiming the delivery up of certain furniture in the defendant's possession which was alleged to form part of the separate property of the deceased, the defendant took out a summons for particulars of the claim.

Held, affirming the decision of North, J., that no order ought to be made upon the summons until the defendant had given discovery as to the furniture in his possession, specifying what he claimed as his.—Miller v. Harper, C.A. 454—38 Ch. D. 110; 58 L. T. 698.

30. Particulars—Libel.—The defendant published articles alleging that the plaintiff, who was Governor of Mauritius, had been charged by members of the council with sending to the Colonial Office garbled reports of their speeches. The articles were alleged by the plaintiff to impute that he had in fact transmitted such garbled accounts. The defendant pleaded that the alleged libels were true in substance and in fact.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to further and better particulars, it not being clear whether the defence meant that what was charged against the plaintiff had been truly reported or that what was reported to have been charged was in fact true.—Hennessy v. Wright (1), C.A. 878.

31. Particulars—Principal and agent—Account—Fraud—Ord. 19, rr. 6, 7, 26.—A defendant charged with fraud is not in all cases entitled to particulars before he puts in his defence; but a defendant who first puts in his defence does not thereby waive his right to particulars.

In an action by a principal against his agents to open settled accounts, the plaintiff, in his statement of claim, alleged a secret fraud by the defendants, but stated that the particulars of the transactions in which the fraud was committed were known to the defendants, but were not known to the plaintiff. The defendants, before delivering a defence, applied for particulars, but the application was ordered to stand over until a defence had been put in.—Sachs v. Spielman, CH.D. NOR., J. 498—37 Ch. D. 295; 57 L. J. Ch. 658; 58 L. T. 102.

32. Particulars—Slander—Persons to whom slander was uttered.—When particulars are required to be given of the names of persons who may have heard the defendant utter certain slanders in a public room, an order that the plaintiff is to deliver "the best particulars he can give of the persons present" when the slanders were uttered is correct, and will not be varied by the court.—Williams v. Ramsdale, Q.B.D. 125.

33. Particulars—Trespass—Highway—Dedication.—In an action to restrain trespass on a road the defendants pleaded that the road was a highway, and were ordered to amend their defence by showing how it had become a highway. The defendants amended by alleging that the road had been for many years used by the public as of right, having been dedicated by the plaintiff and her predecessors in title.

Held that, if the defendants relied on specific acts of dedication, or specific declarations of intention to dedicate, with or without evidence of user, they must give particulars of the nature and dates of such acts or declarations, and the names of the persons doing or making them.—Spedding v. Fitzpatrick, C.A.—38 Ch. D. 410.

34. Striking out—Embarrassment—Compromise of former action—Ord. 19, r. 27.—In an action to enforce a compromise of a former action any statements as to the rights of the parties in the former action will be struck out of the statement of claim.—Knowles v. Roberts, C.A.—38 Ch. D. 263; 58 L. T. 259.

35. Striking out—Embarrassment—Dismissal of action—Foreign Government defendant—Ord. 25, rr. 1, 4.—A statement of claim in an action brought to set aside an agreement of compromise between the defendants and a foreign Government, which alleged that the defendants were in a fiduciary position, and had rendered false accounts and improperly withheld information, and that the agreement of compromise had not been confirmed or ratified by a de jure Government, was ordered to be struck out under ord. 25, r. 4, and the action was dismissed.

Applications under ord. 25, r. 4, must be tried on the allegations contained in the pleading, and other evidence is inadmissible.

Ord. 25, r. 4, is more favourable to the pleading objected to than the old procedure by demurrer.—Republic of Peru v. Peruvian Guano Co., CH.D. CHI., J. 217—36 Ch. D. 489; 56 L. J. Ch. 1081; 57 L. T. 337.

36. Tender—Payment into court—Payment out—Death of plaintiff—Order on solicitor—Ord. 22, rr. 5 (c), 6 (c).—A plea of tender cannot be set up in an action for unliquidated damages.

In an action for wrongful dismissal, claiming a year's salary in lieu of notice, the defendant denied liability for more than a month's salary, or, alternatively, for more than three months' salary, which amount he tendered before action and paid into court, "with defence setting up tender. Soon after the delivery of the defence and before trial, the whole amount so paid in was paid out to the plaintiff's solicitor under ord. 22, r. 5 (c). At the trial the plaintiff obtained a verdict for one month's salary. On an application by the defendant for an order for the repayment of the difference, the court ordered the solicitor to the plaintiff to repay the amount to the defendant. The plaintiff being dead, the solicitor filed an affidavit stating that he had paid the whole amount over to his client after deducting costs.

Held, that the order was wrong, and that, whatever might be the remedy of the defendant against the personal representatives of the plaintiff, there could be no order against the solicitor, who had been guilty of no misconduct.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 36 W. R. 552, 20 Q. B. D. 722) reversed.—Davys v. Richardson, C.A. 728—21 Q. B. D. 202; 57 L. J. Q. B. 409.

RECEIVER—

37. Rent—Distress—Chief clerk's certificate.—Where a chief clerk's certificate has found a sum to be due from the defendants for rent, the court will not hear an application for an order to the receiver to distrain for such rent.—Craven v. Ingham, CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. T. 486.

STAY OF PROCEEDINGS—

38. Lis alibi pendens—Colonial action—Partnership—Account—Counter-claim—Striking out—Ord. 19, r. 27; ord. 21, r. 15; ord. 25, r. 4.—A partnership firm, consisting of M., C., and B., carried on business in British Honduras. B. also carried on business in London in partnership with N. The London firm acted as agents of the Honduras firm, under an agreement which provided that B.'s share in the profits of the Honduras firm was to be brought into the accounts between the two firms to the credit of the London firm. B. brought an action in Honduras against M. & C., and a decree was obtained in that action to have the partnership accounts of the Honduras firm taken. Before the accounts in that action were taken, though after the decree was made, M. & C. brought this action in England against B. & N., claiming an account of all moneys received and paid by the defendants as agents of the Honduras firm. The defendants, B. & N., counter-claimed to have the accounts of the Honduras partnership firm taken. On the application of the plaintiffs, M. & C., North, J., ordered that the defendants' counter-claim be struck out, on the ground that, in the exercise of his discretion, he considered that the counter-claim could not be conveniently tried with the original claim, and on other grounds also.

Held, on appeal, that though any action for taking the accounts of the Honduras firm brought by B. in England after having obtained a decree for the same purpose in Honduras would be stayed, yet, as the action brought in England against B. & N. by M. & C. claimed to have the accounts taken as between the two firms, and as the profits due to B. as a partner in the Honduras firm should be ascertained before the account claimed by the plaintiffs' English action could be finally settled, B. ought not to be precluded from claiming, by way of counter-claim in the English action, to have the accounts of the Honduras partnership taken, and that, on N., undertaking to be bound by the proceedings in the Honduras action, the order of North, J., should be discharged.—Mutrie v. Binney, C.A. 131—35 Ch. D. 614.

TRIAL—

39. Jury—Mortgage—Redemption—Counter-claim—Ord. 19, r. 3; ord. 21, r. 15; ord. 36, r. 6.—The plaintiff, in his statement of claim, claimed (1) redemption of certain securities, consisting of shares; (2) damages for wrongful detention and conversion of the shares; and (3) a receiver. The defendant counter-claimed against the plaintiff for (1) an account of what was due to the defendant by the plaintiff; (2) damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, whereby the defendant was induced to credit the plaintiff with the proceeds of certain of the shares which had been sold. After the institution of the action the plaintiff, under an order of the Court of Appeal, paid into court a sum of money admitted to be sufficient—apart from the question of fraud raised by the counter-claim—to satisfy what might be due by the plaintiff to the defendant. Before notice of trial had been given the plaintiff applied for an order for trial of the action with a jury.

Held, that ord. 36, r. 6, was not applicable, and that the plaintiff was not entitled as of right to a trial with a jury.

An application on behalf of the plaintiff at the hearing of the appeal for an order that the counter-claim might be tried separately, was refused, on the ground that the plaintiff ought to have made an application for that purpose before reply, under ord. 21, r. 15, or applied before trial to have the counter-claim disallowed under ord. 19, r. 3.

Decision of North, J. (reported 36 W. R. 136, 37 Ch. D. 227), affirmed.—Lynch v. Macdonald, C.A. 419—57 L. J. Ch. 651.

40. Jury — Nuisance — Injunction — Discretion of judge—Ord. 36, rr. 6, 7.—An action for an injunction to restrain a nuisance is not a cause or matter coming within ord. 36, r. 6, so as to entitle as of right any party to the action to an order for trial with a jury.

The Temple Bar, 34 W. R. 68, 11 P. D. 6, followed.

Decision of Kay, J., affirmed.—Fanshawe v. London and Provincial Dairy Co., C.A. 418—38 Ch. D. 72; 59 L. T. 76.

41. Jury—Time—Expiration of notice of trial—Ord. 36, rr. 6, 16.—A notice of trial of an action being no longer in force by reason of the cause not having been entered for trial by either party within the time required by ord. 36, r. 16, the plaintiff gave a second notice of trial and applied for a trial by jury.

Held (Manisty, J., dissenting), that the application, not having been made within ten days of the first notice of trial, was too late under ord. 36, r. 6.—Tonsley v. Heffer, Q.B.D. 48—19 Q. B. D. 153; 56 L. J. Q. B. 656; 57 L. T. 481.

42. New trial—Divorce suit—Misdirection—Notice of motion.—On an application for the new trial of a divorce suit on the ground of misdirection, the nature of the misdirection complained of must be specifically stated in the notice of motion.—Taplin v. Taplin and Holland, P.D. & A.D.—13 P. D. 100; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 79; 58 L. T. 925.

43. Trade name—Injunction—Damages—Discovery. The plaintiff in an action in the Chancery Division claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from representing his goods as those of the plaintiff, delivery up of labels in imitation of the plaintiff's label, damages for false representations, and in the alternative an account of profits. An order was made directing the questions of fact arising in the action to be tried by a jury.

Held, that the questions of fact were those questions on which the plaintiff's title to relief depended, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to discovery of sales effected by the defendant, nor to production of the defendant's books, until he had made out his title to relief.—Fennessy v. Clark, C.A.—37 Ch. D. 184; 57 L. J. Ch. 398; 58 L. T. 289.

VERDICT—

44. New trial.—Where there is evidence on both sides which has been properly submitted to a jury, the verdict ought not to be set aside.—New South Wales Railway Commissioners v. Brown, P.C.—13 App. 133; 57 L. J. P. C. 72.

WRIT—

45. Executor—Co-executor—Injunction—Receiver—Ord. 5, r. 15.—Immediately after the death of a testator who had left a will duly executed appointing two executors, and before probate, one of the executors, contrary to the wish of the other executor, proceeded to deal with the personal property, which was of considerable value, by depositing precious stones in his own name and making preparations for the sale of furniture, &c. The other executor desired to issue a writ in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division for an injunction and receiver, and filed an affidavit for that purpose in accordance with ord. 5, r. 15.

The court gave leave to issue the writ.—Ker v. Aubert, P.D. & A.D. 576—57 L. J. P. D. & A. 37; 58 L. T. 386.

46. Service—Irregularity—Foreign defendants—Address of defendants—Ord. 2, r. 3—Ord. 9, r. 8.—A writ of summons for service within the jurisdiction directed to a foreign corporation, but not containing any address, either of the corporation or of one of the officers of the corporation upon whom the writ may be served, under ord. 9, r. 8, will, on application of any person served with such writ, be set aside as irregularly issued.—The W. A. Scholten, P.D. & A.D. 559—13 P. D. 8; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 4; 58 L. T. 91.

47. Service out of the jurisdiction—Charging order on shares—Ord. 11. r. 1 (e); ord. 46, r. 1—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14.—Ord 11, r. 1 (e), of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, does not apply to the case of an action to enforce a charge obtained on shares under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, and leave cannot be obtained to issue a writ for service out of the jurisdiction in such an action.—Moritz v. Stephen, CH.D. MOR., J. 779—58 L. T. 850.

48. Service out of the jurisdiction—Co-defendants—Alternative remedies.—Ord. 11, r. 1 (g).—H. & Co., brokers in London, acting as agents for S. & Co., an Austrian firm, entered into a contract with the plaintiffs. S. & Co. afterwards repudiated the contract, on the ground that the agents had inserted a term without their authority. The plaintiffs brought an action against H. & Co. and S. & Co., claiming alternatively against H. & Co. for breach of implied warranty of authority, and against S. & Co. for breach of contract.

Held, that an order giving leave to the plaintiffs to serve notice of a concurrent writ out of the jurisdiction on S. & Co., under ord. 11, r. 1 (g), was rightly made.—Massey v. Heynes, C.A. 834—21 Q. B. D. 330; 57 L. J. Q. B. 521.

49. Service out of the jurisdiction—Contract affecting land—Outgoing tenant—Compensation—Ord. 11, r. 1 (b).—An action by an outgoing tenant in Yorkshire to obtain compensation for tenant-right according to the custom of the country is an action to enforce "a contract, obligation, or liability affecting land" within paragraph (b) of ord. 11, r. 1, and service of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction will be permitted in that behalf.

50. Service out of the jurisdiction—Contract to be performed in England—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).—By a contract made by the plaintiffs, a firm carrying on business at Lincoln, and the defendants, a mining company carrying on business in the Isle of Man, it was agreed that the plaintiffs should make an engine and deliver it to the defendants, and erect it on the defendants' premises in the Isle of Man, and that the defendants should pay for the same on their engineer giving his certificate that it had been erected to his satisfaction. Nothing was specified in the contract as to the place where payment was to be made. The plaintiffs, who alleged that they had performed their part of the contract, desired to sue the defendants for the purchase-money in the High Court.

Held, that the contract to pay was a contract which ought to be performed at Lincoln, and that there was power to allow a writ to be served out of the jurisdiction.—Robey v. Snaefell Mining Co., Q.B.D. 224—20 Q. B. D. 152; 57 L. J. Q. B. 134.

51. Service out of the jurisdiction—Injunction—Trade-mark—Defendant in Scotland—Agents in England.—A pending summons by A., a manufacturer residing in Scotland, to register a trade-mark, was opposed by B., another manufacturer residing in Scotland, on the ground that the trade-mark was similar to B.'s trade-mark. B. applied for leave to issue a writ against A. for an injunction and damages, on the ground that A. sold his goods in England so as to cause the public to believe them to be B.'s goods. B. alleged that the same witnesses would be required in the action as on the summons, and that it would save expense to try the action in England, or to try the summons and the action together.

Held, that, as an injunction in England could only be enforced against A.'s agent, leave for service out of the jurisdiction ought not to be granted.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.—Marshall v. Marshall, C.A.—38 Ch. D. 330.

52. Service out of the jurisdiction—Irregularity—Setting aside—Ord. 11, r. 6—Ord. 70, rr. 1, 2.—Service of a copy of a writ was made by leave, under a mistaken belief as to the state of facts, upon F., a foreigner residing out of British jurisdiction. F. took no steps to have the service set aside or to enter an appearance, and judgment was signed against him four months after the service of the writ.

Held, that a notice of the writ, and not any service of the writ, was compulsory upon a non-British subject not in British dominions, under ord. 11, r. 6; and that such a wrongful service was not an irregularity which could be dealt with under ord. 70, r. 1, and that the defendant was not estopped, under ord. 70, r. 2, from taking steps to set aside the proceedings.—Hewitson v. Fabre, Q.B.D. 717—21 Q. B. D. 6; 57 L. J. Q. B. 449; 58 L. T. 856.

53. Service out of the jurisdiction—Irregularity—Waiver—Ord. 63, r. 12—Ord. 70, r. 2.—A judge in the vacation made an order ex parte for service of writ and notice of motion for an injunction by service at the place of business and on the solicitors of a foreigner residing out of the jurisdiction. The defendant entered no appearance, but filed affidavits and opposed the motion.

Held, that the defendant had waived any irregularity in the service.—Boyle v. Sacker, C.A.—58 L. T. 822.

54. Service out of the jurisdiction — Lancaster Palatine Court—Leave of Vice-Chancellor—Court of Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 82), s. 8—Chancery of Lancaster Rules, 1884, ord. 2, r. 4; ord. 12, rr. 1, 7.—Before an application is made to the Court of Appeal for leave to serve a writ issued out of the Palatine Court upon a defendant who is out of the jurisdiction of that court, but within the jurisdiction of the High Court, the leave of the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court must first have been obtained to the issue of the writ.

Counsel, on making such application, ought to inform the court that the leave of the Vice-Chancellor has already been obtained.—Walker v. Dodds, C.A. 133—37 Ch. D. 188; 57 L. J. Ch. 206; 58 L. T. 291.

54a. Service out of the jurisdiction—Scotch company—Branch business in England—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 62—Ord. 9, r. 8.—A company had its registered office in Scotland, but carried on branch works in England. The writ in the action had been served on the manager of the branch works, and a copy had also been sent by post to the registered office.

Held, that the service was bad, and must be set aside. — Wood v. Anderston Foundry Co., CH.D. REG., J. 918.

55. Service out of the jurisdiction—Ord. 11, r. 1.—On an application under order 11 for leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction, it is the duty of the court, in considering whether or not such service ought to be allowed, to go into the facts of the case in order to see if there is any probable cause of action.

56. Special indorsement—Judgment—Ord. 3, r. 6—Ord. 14, r. 1.—A writ which claims payment of a sum which is in dispute, besides payment of a liquidated demand, is not specially indorsed so as to entitle the plaintiff to summary judgment for the liquidated demand.—Clarke v. Berger, C.A. 809.

57. Special indorsement—Judgment—Setting aside—Irregularity—Appeal—Ord. 21, rr. 6, 7—Ord. 70, r. 1.—Where a writ of summons is specially indorsed, the defendant has, under ord. 21, r. 6, ten days from the time limited for appearance to deliver his defence, the indorsement on the writ being a statement of claim within that rule, and he is not bound to deliver his defence within ten days after appearance under rule 7.

A defendant was served with a specially-indorsed writ on the 21st of January, and entered an appearance on the 26th. The plaintiff having signed judgment on the 7th of February for want of a statement of defence, the defendant took out a summons to have the judgment set aside, with costs, upon the ground that it had been prematurely signed. The court set aside the judgment upon the defendant paying a certain sum into court, costs to be costs in the cause. The defendant appealed, having paid the money into court.

Held, (1) that, as the defendant had ten days from the 28th of January to deliver his defence, the judgment was prematurely signed and was irregular, and the defendant was entitled ex debito justitiæ to have it set aside without terms, the irregularity not being a mere non-compliance with the rules within ord. 70, r. 1; (2) that the defendant, by asking for costs in the summons, did not give the court jurisdiction to impose terms, though the court, having discretion as to the costs, was enabled to exact terms as a condition of giving costs; (3) that the defendant, by paying the money into court, had not so availed himself of the order of the Divisional Court as to be precluded from appealing.—Anlaby v. Prætorius, C.A. 487—20 Q. B. D. 764; 57 L. J. Q. B. 287; 58 L. T. 674.

a person "domiciled or ordinarily resident in Ireland" owing to ord. 11, r. 1 (e), the court will not allow substituted service to be made.—Hillyard v. Smyth, Q.B.D. 7.

A barrister and solicitor of Honduras appealed against a verdict convicting him of perjury, and against an order of court, founded on the conviction, directing him to be struck off the roll of practitioners.

Held, that, the directions of the judge having been grievously unjust to the appellant, the conviction and consequential order must be set aside.—In re Dillet, P.C. 81—12 App. 459; 56 L. T. 615.

PROBATE DUTY:—

Lunacy—Accumulation—Conversion—Purchase of land.—The accumulations of the personal estate of a lunatic were invested in the purchase of land by his committee under the orders of the Lords Justices. By the conveyance made in pursuance of the orders, the lands were conveyed to the use of the committee, their heirs and assigns, upon trust for the lunatic, his executors, administrators, and assigns, either until the inquisition as regarded his soundness of mind should be superseded, or until his death, whichever should first happen, and until such time the grantees had certain powers of leasing, selling, or exchanging. Each conveyance also declared that the premises thereby granted were, "to all intents and purposes, to be considered as part of the personal estate" of the lunatic, but there was no trust for sale. Upon the death of the lunatic the Crown claimed probate duty on the value of the investment in land.

Held, that the value of the lands was part of the personal estate of the lunatic at his death, and liable to probate duty.

Held (Lopes, L.J., dissenting), that the property of the Institution of Civil Engineers is entitled to the benefit of the exemption, as property which, in the main and as its chief object, is appropriated and applied for the promotion of mechanical science.

No.* 11, ss. 9, 11.—The history of miner's rights issued under the Gold Fields Act, 1874 (24 Vict. No. 11), and the regulations under that Act, brought an action to set aside mining leases granted to the defendants on the ground that they had been granted within two years from the date of the proclamation of the gold fields within which the land was comprised, and that the defendants, when applying for the leases, had not complied with the regulations.

Held, that the plaintiffs had no right to interfere with the defendants' possession.—Osborne v. Morgan, P.C.—13 App. 227; 57 L. J. P. C. 53.

2. *Gold fields—Mining rights—Crown lease—28 Vict. 1. Arbitration—Railway Commissioners—Jurisdiction—Prohibition—Regulation of Railways Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 48), s. 8.—By a private Act between two railway companies an agreement made between them was set out verbatim as a schedule, which contained a clause that all questions of difference arising between them should be determined by arbitration in manner provided by the Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859; and this was "confirmed and made binding" by a clause of the private Act. Differences having arisen, one company desired to refer the dispute to the Railway Commissioners, under section 8 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873.

Held, that the right to refer differences to arbitration was derived from the agreement itself, and that, as the difference was not "required or authorised to be referred to arbitration under the provisions of any general or special Act" within section 8 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, the Railway Commissioners had no jurisdiction to undertake the arbitration.—Reg. v. Midland Railway Co., Q.B.D. 270—19 Q. A receiver appointed under that section will not be discharged until every judgment creditor of the company—whose judgment has been recovered either in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of the Act, or in an action not on contract brought after that date—has been satisfied; and therefore the section neither contemplates nor permits the making of successive receivership orders.

Order of Kekewich, J., discharged.—In re Mary Railway Co., C.A. 372—37 Ch. D. 610; 57 L. J. Ch. 283; 58 L. T. 179.

4. Manager—Appointment—Discretion of court—Railway Companies Act, 1867, s. 4.—In exercising jurisdiction under section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, relative to the appointing of a manager of a railway company at the instance of judgment creditors, the court should take a broad view of the position and exigencies of the company, and act for the general benefit of all the creditors; but the court is not to consider itself fettered by any contract or arrangement between the company and any person.—In re Hull, Barnsley, and West Riding Railway Co., CH.D. CHL., J.—57 L. T. 82.

5. Minerals—Notice by owner—Quarrying—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, ss. 77, 78.—An owner of mines or minerals lying under a railway who is desirous of working them, not as his own speculation, but through the medium of lessees, is a person entitled, under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to give notice of intention to work the same.

To justify an owner giving such a notice, there must be not merely an expression of a desire, but an honest actual existence of a desire, to work, either by himself or his lessees, the mines or minerals.

The words "mines" and "minerals," as used in section 77 and the following sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, extend to open quarries and to minerals got by open quarrying.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.—Midland Railway Co. v. Robinson, C.A. 650—37 Ch. D. 387; 57 L. J. Ch. 441.

6. Negligence—Cattle—Burden of proof.—In an action against a railway company for injuries to cattle proved to have been safely placed in the defendants' truck, but found to be injured on arrival at their destination, the burden of proving negligence is on the plaintiff.—Smith v. Midland Railway Co., Q.B.D.—57 L. T. 813.

7. Negligence—Contributory negligence.—When, in an action of negligence, the defendant relies on the doctrine Volenti non fit injuria, he must obtain a finding at the trial that the plaintiff voluntarily took the risk upon himself and had a full knowledge of the nature and extent of the danger, since otherwise the court will not give judgment for the defendant on the ground that such a finding is the only inference which can properly be drawn from the facts.—Osborne v. London and North-Western Railway Co., Q.B.D. 269—21 Q. B. D. 220.

8. Negligence — Contributory negligence — Level crossing.—About 3 p.m. B. crossed the defendants' railway near a station by a level crossing. On each side of the line there was a large swing gate, as well as a wicket for foot passengers. An express train was due at 2.30, but was about forty minutes late, and another train was due at 3.15 The swing gates were shut, but no attempt was made to prevent B. from crossing. While B. was in the space between the up and down lines, a person on the platform called out, "Look out for the train." B. became confused, ran forward, and was killed by the train. There was evidence that the whistle had been sounded, and the train was visible for 200 yards from the crossing.

Held, that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants.—Curtin v. Great Southern and Western Railway Co., C.A. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 219.

9. Negligence—Passenger's luggage—Custody of company.—The plaintiff's wife arrived, with three articles of luggage, at the defendants' station forty minutes before the departure of the train by which she was to travel. A porter took the luggage from her and placed it on a trolley, and labelled two of the articles, she saying that she wished the other article—a bag—to be put into the carriage with her, and asking the porter if it would be safe to leave it with him while she went to meet her husband, who was to travel with her, and to get her ticket. The porter replied that it would, and that he would guard the luggage and put it in the train. The train was not then alongside the platform. When she returned in ten minutes with her husband, whom she had met in the station, and who had taken her ticket for her, the bag was missing. The county court judge found that the porter was negligent in not guarding the bag, and in not being in readiness to put the bag into the carriage.

Held (Lord Bramwell dissenting), that there was evidence to justify the finding of the county court judge, that the bag was in the custody of the railway company for present transit from the time of its delivery to the porter, and that the loss was due to the company's negligence.

Semble, that, where a passenger's luggage is placed, at his request and with the assent of the company, in the carriage in which he is to travel, the contract is one of common carriage, subject to the modification that, in respect of his interference with their exclusive control of his luggage, the company is not liable for any loss or injury occurring during its transit to which the act or default of the passenger has contributed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 34 W. R. 574, 17 Q. B. D. 215) affirmed.

10. Passenger—Assault—False imprisonment—Loss of ticket. — Where a railway passenger has taken and paid for his ticket, but has afterwards lost it, and has declined to pay the fare again, the company cannot eject him from the railway carriage, but can only take his name and address and sue him for the fare.—Butler v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., C.A. 726—21 Q. B. D. 207.

11. Passenger's luggage — Delivery — Reasonable time.—It is the duty of a railway company, with regard to the luggage of a passenger which travels by the same train with him, but not under his control, when it has reached its destination, to have it ready for delivery upon the platform at the usual place of delivery until the owner, in the exercise of due diligence, can receive it; but the liability of the company as carriers will cease after a reasonable time has been allowed to the owner to do so.—Firth v. North-Eastern Railway Co., Q.B.D. 467.

12. Poor rate—Deficiency—County rate—Borough rate—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 133—County Rates Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 81), s. 26—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 145.—Where a railway company is liable to make good a deficiency in a poor rate under section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in calculating such deficiency both the county rate and, in the case of a parish wholly within a borough, the borough rate, ought to be included in the poor rate.—Farmer v. London and North-Western Railway Co., Q.B.D. 590—20 Q. B. D. 788.

13. Receiver—Dock company—Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), ss. 3, 4.—By a special Act promoted and obtained by a railway company, certain articles of agreement set forth in a schedule to the Act, and made between the railway company and a dock company, were confirmed. This agreement provided that the dock company should construct so much of the line as passed through their land;-that the dock company should, at their option, have the management of and work that part of the line; and that the management of that part of the line, if worked by the railway company, should be subject to the control of the dock company. Prior to and apart from the special Act, the dock company had no power to construct or work a line of railway. After the passing of the special Act the dock company constructed on their land the line of railway mentioned, and worked and managed it themselves.

Held, that the dock company came within the interpretation of the term "railway company" in section 3 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, and that the court had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver and manager of the undertaking under section 4 of the Act of 1867.

Held, also, that the receivership order was not to be limited to the moneys received by the dock company in respect of the railway, but should extend to the whole undertaking of the dock company.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.—In re East and West India Docks Co., C.A. 849—38 Ch. D. 576.

SCOTLAND, LAW of:—

1. Execution—Residuary gift—Warrandice—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 101) s. 8.—In 1853 A., by a depositio mortis caused, conveyed his whole estate to trustee, in order to convey his M. estate to his brother in strict entail. By a codicil executed in 1876, after his marriage, he left to his wife his D. and B. estates, which were to be excepted from the land to be entailed under the deed of 1853, and he also bequeathed to her his residuary estate. He had previously appointed his wife sole executrix. The codicil contained a clause of warrandice under section 8 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868. In 1882 A. executed a bond for £250,000 over the M., D., and B. estates.

Held, that A.'s widow, as executrix and personal representative, must discharge the obligation of warrandice.—Duchess of Montrose v. Stuart, H.L.—13 App. 81.

2. Husband and wife—Post-nuptial settlement—Assent by wife.—A. by a trust disposition and settlement directed his trustees to pay the whole income of his estate to his wife, and "after the death of the longest liver of me and my wife to convert into money all my estate and, with her consent," to pay certain legacies. Power of alteration and revocation was reserved to A.

The wife signed the instrument, and survived A. by two months.

Held, that the wife had power to accept the provision, and the representatives had no right to her terce and jus relictæ.—Edward v. Cheyne, H.L.—13 App. 373.

3. Husband and wife—Separate estate—Gift to husband—Revocation.—By the law of Scotland a married woman may make a gift of her separate estate to her husband, and she may make the gift even after his death.—Edward v. Cheyne (2) H.L.—13 App. 385.

4. Prescription—Sea shore—Rights of Crown—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 94) s. 34.—A. sought to establish his title against the Crown and the railway company to the foreshore of the sea opposite his land, claiming under a grant of feu to his ancestor in 1804, which described the property as land bounded by the sea. A. gave no evidence that the grantor had an express title from the Crown, but set up a right to the foreshore by prescriptive possession following his own title. In 1827 A.'s predecessor had built a retaining wall on a part of the foreshore, and both A. and his predecessors and tenants had taken sand, stones, and sea-weed from the shore.

Held, that A. had sufficiently proved possession of the foreshore for the period prescribed by the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, and had established a right to the foreshore against the Crown.—Lord Advocate v. Young; North British Railway Co. v. Young, H.L.—12 App. 544.

SETTLEMENT:—

1. After-acquired property—Covenant to settle—Separate estate—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 5, 19.—A marriage settlement made in 1870 contained a covenant by the husband for the settlement of any future acquired property of the wife exceeding a specified amount, except jewellery and similar articles. The wife, after the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, became absolutely entitled under a will made in 1883 to a share of the residuary estate, which exceeded the specified amount, without any limitation as to separate use.

Held, that the fact that the covenant was a covenant by the husband only did not prevent the settlement being a settlement within the meaning of section 19 of the Act, and the effect of that section was to prevent the separate use given to the wife by the Act, excluding the operation of the settlement; and that the wife's share was bound by the covenant to settle after-acquired property.

In re Queade's Trusts, 33 W. R. 816, not followed.

Decision of North, J., (reported 36 W. R. 166), affirmed.—Hancock v. Hancock, C.A. 417—38 Ch. D. 78; 57 L. J. Ch. 396; 58 L. T. 906.

2. After-acquired property—Covenant to settle—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation.—On the 5th of June, 1860, A. and B., in exercise of a power of appointment contained in their marriage settlement, appointed £3,500 to their daughter D. On the 6th of June, by the marriage settlement of H. and D., D. assigned the £3,500 to trustees upon certain trusts, providing a first life interest for H., and a general testamentary power of appointment for D. in default of children. There was also a covenant by H. and D. to assure to the trustees any after-acquired property, except certain specified interests. On the 20th of June A. and B. appointed that a part of the unappointed residue under their settlement should go to D. during coverture for her separate use without power of anticipation, and it was provided that if D. should die in E.'s lifetime leaving no children, the same moiety should go to M., the son of A. and B. absolutely, and that it should go to D. absolutely if she survived E. D. died in 1887, leaving children, and having by her will left all her property to E., and appointed him sole executor. A. and B. had predeceased D.

Held, that the restraint on anticipation, though invalid, showed an intention that D. should have no power of disposition over the corpus, which was affected by the covenant to settle after-acquired property.—Shute v. Hogge, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 546.

3. Condition — Forfeiture — Non-residence — Temporary letting—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 15, 51, 52.—A mansion and demesne in the county of Dublin were settled upon the same trusts as land in the counties of Mayo and Sligo, with a condition of forfeiture on non-residence, selling, or, letting.

Held, that the condition of forfeiture was void for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and that the court would authorise a temporary letting.—In re Thompson, M.R. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 109.

4. Construction—"Issue then in being"—Power of appointment—Mortgage.—By a marriage settlement the husband granted freehold property to trustees upon trust for himself for life, and after his death to convey the lands and pay the rents "unto and for the benefit of all and every or any one or more child or children, or any grandchild or grandchildren, or other issue then in being of the said intended marriage for such estate or interest, and in such shares and subject to such conditions as the settlor should by deed or will appoint." All the children of the marriage attained the age of twenty-one. The husband appointed a part of the property in favour of his eldest son, his heirs and assigns, and joined with him in a mortgage of the same part.

Held, that the appointment was valid, and that the mortgage passed the fee.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal in Ireland affirmed.—Leader v. Duffey, H.L.—13 App. 294; 59 L. T. 9.

5. Construction — Merger—Charge—Life estate—Power of appointment.—In 1829 S., by his marriage settlement, assigned £7,500, which he charged on an estate to which he was absolutely entitled, to his trustees, in trust for himself for life, and after his death to his wife for life, and after the deaths of both in trust for all the children of the marriage as S. should by deed or will appoint. The issue of the marriage was one son and two daughters. In 1851 S., by his will, appointed to his son £5,000 out of the settled fund, and devised to him and the heirs of his body the land on which the fund was charged. In 1858, by a codicil, he revoked the former devise, and bequeathed the land to his son for life, with remainder to such uses as the latter should by deed or will appoint. In 1872 the son, by his marriage settlement, which recited the devises of land, but not the charge thereon, appointed the land after his death to trustees for 200 years, to secure a strict settlement for his wife, with remainder to the sons and daughters successively of his intended, or any subsequent, marriage, with ultimate remainder to himself in fee.

Held, that the charge was not merged, and that the £5,000 was still part of the son's personal estate.—Smith v. Smith, M.R. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 514.

6. Construction—"Unmarried"—Next of kin—Ultimate trust.—The meaning of the word "unmarried," in the absence of any context showing a different meaning, is "without ever having been married."

By a marriage settlement, property belonging to the wife was settled, in events which happened, subject to the life interests of the husband and wife, in trust for such person or persons as, under or by virtue of the statute for the distribution of intestates' effects, should at the time of the decease of the wife have been entitled to her personal estate as her next of kin "in case she had died intestate and unmarried."

Held, that, in the absence of anything to show a contrary intention, "unmarried" must be construed "without ever having been married."—Blundell v. De Falbe, CH.D. NOR., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 576; 58 L. T. 621.

7. Infant—Ratification—Power of appointment.—By marriage settlements made in 1834 power was given to the intended husband and wife, or the survivor of them, by deed or by will, to appoint the settled property among the children of the intended marriage. There were three daughters, one unmarried and two married. The wife died without having joined in making any appointment, and the husband, by his will, appointed the property among the three daughters equally, subject to the proviso that the share of any daughter who should be unmarried at his decease should be held in trust for her for life for her separate use, and after her decease, as to capital and income, in case she should leave children, in trust for such persons as she should appoint, and in default of appointment or if she should not leave issue upon trust in favour of the other children. The unmarried daughter remained single at her father's death.

Held, that she was entitled to her share absolutely, the proviso being void for remoteness and inseverable.

By one of the settlements, to which the father and mother of the intended wife, the intended husband, and the intended wife—who was then an infant—were parties, the father and mother of the intended wife agreed, and the intended husband covenanted, that the husband and wife would, on her attaining twenty-one, convey the wife's reversionary freeholds to the trustees upon the trusts of the settlement. In 1836 the husband and wife — the latter having attained twenty-one—conveyed the freeholds to the trustees.

Held, that, for the purpose of the rule against perpetuities, the real estate was settled and the power of appointment conferred in 1834.—Cooke v. Cooke, CH.D. NOR., J. 756—38 Ch. D. 202.

8. Infant—Ward of court—Misrepresentation—Estoppel.—Proposals for a settlement on the marriage of an infant ward of court were brought into chambers, and purported to set out the property to which the infant was entitled as tenant in tail under a settlement of 1857; but by inadvertence a sale of some of the real estate to the London School Board and the payment into court of the purchase-money was overlooked, and the property described as though no such sale had taken place. The trustees of the settlement made an affidavit, which was read in support of the proposals, and which contained the same mistake. On the basis of the proposals, the court sanctioned a settlement, which was carried out by the infant disentailing under the Infants' Settlement Act, 1855. The infant married, attained the age of twenty-one, disentailed the fund in court, and settled it upon herself.

Held, that the trustee of this last settlement and the wife were estopped from setting up a title to the fund adverse to the trustees of her marriage settlement, in consequence of the misrepresentation of the trustees of the settlement of 1857, which misrepresentation had been made on her behalf.—Mills v. Fox, CH.D. STI., J. 219—37 Ch. D. 153; 57 L. J. Ch. 56; 57 L. T. 792.

9. Mortgage—Married woman—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Notice to trustees—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 39.—The court made an order enabling a married woman, without service of notice to her trustees, to mortgage a life interest as to which she was restrained from anticipation.—In re Little, C.A.—36 Ch. 10. Payment into court—Payment out—Sale of real estate—Affidavit of no incumbrances.—Applications, by persons claiming to be absolutely entitled, for payment out of money in court representing real estate, should be supported by an affidavit of no incumbrances, and primâ facie the applicant is the proper person to make the affidavit.—Williams v. Ware, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 497.

11. Portions—Satisfaction—Will.—A., by a marriage settlement, conveyed land to trustees, to raise £3,000 for the children of the marriage in such shares as A. should appoint, and in default of appointment between such children equally. A. had three sons and six daughters, and no power of appointment was executed. By his will A. bequeathed his residuary estate, which realised a larger fund than his daughters would have been entitled to under the settlement, upon trust, after the death of his wife, to whom he gave the interest for life for the maintenance of his daughters, to pay to each daughter one-sixth of the interest while unmarried, and a fifth share of the principal on marriage, with a gift over to the survivors of the share of any daughter dying unmarried.

Held, that the will operated to satisfy the portions given to the daughters by the settlement—In re Battersby, L.J. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 359.

12. Rectification—Undue influence—Father of wife.—A father living on friendly terms with his daughter is a proper person to advise her as to the provisions of her marriage settlement, and independent legal advice for the daughter is unnecessary, unless the father is, under the settlement, taking a benefit from the daughter.

13. Tenancy for life—Cutting timber—Injunction—Undertaking as to damages.—The plaintiff was tenant in tail in remainder, and the defendant was tenant pur autre vie, of an estate settled in 1855. There was no mansion on the estate till 1858, when a house was acquired by an exchange of land under a power in the settlement. The defendant having cut down trees, and advertised a sale of timber, an injunction was granted against him.

The court directed an inquiry as to what trees could be cut without injury to the property, the injunction being conditional on the plaintiff giving an undertaking as to damages.—Ashby v. Hinchs, CH.D. STL., J.—58 L. T. 557.

14. Tenancy for life—Heirlooms—Sale by tenant for life—Discretion of court—Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 37, 53.—A tenant for life of settled estates applied for the sanction of the court to a sale of heirlooms, the proceeds to be applied in reduction of charges on the estate. The estimated value of the heirlooms was £7,300, the annual income being about £7,500. The trustees and guardians of the tenant in tail in remainder were opposed to the sale.

The court, in its discretion, refused to sanction the sale.—In re Beaumont's Settled Estates, CH.D. CHI., J. —58 L. T. 916.

15. Tenancy for life—Improvements—Drainage—Interest—Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 21, 22, 25, 28, 33, 44—Settled Land Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2—Improvement of Land Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 114), s. 66.—Trustees applied for liberty to apply capital in their hands of settled land in payment of instalments or proportionate repayments of a loan of £2,704, borrowed in 1879 for the improvement of the estate, to secure which the estate was charged with repayment by half-yearly instalments, consisting partly of principal and partly of interest, calculated so as to pay off the whole debt and interest in twenty-five years.

Held, that, as the improvements were such as were authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1882, the trustees might from time to time apply capital in their hands in payment of such part of the instalments as should consist of capital, but that the tenant for life must keep down the interest.—In re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates, CH.D. 16. Tenancy for life—Improvements—Payment out of capital—Excess of estimate—Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 26.—Where a scheme for the permanent improvement of a settled estate, by providing it with an additional water supply, and thus rendering it available as a building estate, had been submitted to the trustees and approved by them, and in carrying out the scheme it was found necessary to incur additional expense to that authorised by the scheme, the court, being satisfied that the additional expense was incurred for wok which fell substantially within the scheme, made an order, under section 26 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, directing the trustees to apply the capital moneys forming part of the settled property in payment of the additional expense.

17. Tenancy for life—Power of sale—Timber—Costs—Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 21, sub-sections 9, 10.—Costs properly incurred by a tenant for life in defending an action to restrain the exercise of his power of sale are costs incidental to the exercise of his powers, in discharge of which capital money may be applied under section 21, sub-section 9, of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

An action by remaindermen to restrain trustees and the tenant for life from exercising a power of sale under a will was dismissed, with costs. While the proceedings were pending, the Settled Land Act, 1882, came into operation, and the property was subsequently sold under the powers of that Act.

Held, that the tenant for life was entitled to have paid to him out of the purchase-money the difference between his party and party and solicitor and client costs of so much of the action as related to the exercise of his powers under the Act.

A tenant for life was authorised by a will to fell timber beginning to decay and sell the same for his own benefit.

Held, upon a sale, under the Settled Land Act, 1882, of the land and the timber, some of which was decaying, but had never been severed, that the tenant for life had never become absolutely entitled to any of the timber, and was not entitled to any part of the purchase-money of the timber, by virtue either of the will or of the Settled Land Act, 1882.—Llewellin v. Williams, CH.D. 19. Title—Railway stock—Transfer—Non-registration—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16), ss. 14—16.—In 1868 certain railway stock was standing in the names of A. and B., who were trustees of it for C. In that year a transfer of the stock by A. and B. to C. was executed and sent to the company for registration; but, in consequence of its being improperly stamped, and the stock certificate not being sent with it, it was returned by the company unregistered. The proper stamp was then affixed, but no further step was taken until 1872. In 1869 C. purported, by a voluntary deed, to settle the stock. The Act by which the stock was created incorporated the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

Held, that, at the date of the settlement, the stock was not legally vested in C., since it was essential to the validity of the transfer that it should be delivered to the secretary of the company, to be kept by him in accordance with section 15 of the Act; that the transfer, being improperly stamped, was rightly returned by the company; and that the representative of C. must transfer the stock to the trustees of the voluntary settlement.

Decision of Stirling, J. (35 W. R. 713, 35 Ch. D. 598), affirmed.—Nanney v. Morgan, C.A. 677—37 Ch. D. 346; 57 L. J. Ch. 311; 58 L. T. 328.

20. Voluntary settlement — Bankruptcy — Costs—Lien of trustees—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47.—A debtor executed a post-nuptial settlement, but subsequently brought an action to set aside the settlement, which was defended by the trustees, and dismissed, with costs. The debtor thereupon filed his own petition, and became bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement.

Held, that the settlement was void under section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, but that the trustees were entitled to a lien for their costs in the action on a portion of the trust funds.—Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Holden, Q.B.D., BANKY. 189 — 19 Q. B. D. 43; 57 L. J. Q. B. 47; 58 L. T. 118.

21. Voluntary settlement—Consideration—Trader—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), ss. 91, 94, sub-section 3.—By a post-nuptial settlement the settlor, in consideration of the assignment by his father of certain leasehold property to the trustees thereof, and in consideration of a release of a debt due from him to his father, assigned to the trustees two policies of insurance upon his life, upon trust out of the income arising from the leasehold property to pay the premiums on the policies and the residue to the settlor for life, and after his death upon trust, as to all the property, for the settlor's children. Within two years after the date of the settlement the settlor was adjudicated bankrupt under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. Upon the death of the settlor his trustee in bankruptcy claimed the proceeds of the policies, upon the ground that the settlement was void under section 91 of that Act.

Held, that the settlor's father was a "purchaser in good faith and for valuable consideration" within the exception in section 91, and that the settlement was valid.

Held, also, that the settlement was protected by section 94, sub-section 3, as a "dealing with the bankrupt in good faith and for valuable consideration."

Held, also, that a general medical practitioner who supplies the medicines which he prescribes for his patients, but who makes no charge for medicines, charging only for attendance, is not a "trader" within the meaning of the Act.—Hance v. Harding, C.A. 629—20 Q. B. D. 732; 57 L. J. Q. B. 403.

22. Voluntary settlement—Limitation to children of former marriage—Mortgage—27 Eliz. c. 4.—The principle of Newstead v. Searles, 1 Atk. 265, 9 App. Cas. 320n, that the children of a widow by a former marriage taking under a settlement made on her second marriage are not to be treated as volunteers, does not extend to the case of the children of a widower.

By a settlement made on the second marriage of a widower land belonging to him was conveyed in trust for his children by a first mortgage absolutely, and personalty belonging to the wife was settled on her absolutely. The husband afterwards mortgaged the land.

Held, that the settlement was voluntary as regards the children of the husband, and that, by 27 Eliz. c. 4, the limitation in their favour was void as against the mortgagee.—In re Cameron and Wells, CH.D. KAY, J. 5—37 Ch. D. 32; 57 L. J. Ch. 69; 57 L. T. 645.

23. Voluntary settlement—Mortgage—Accumulations.—A settlor, by a voluntary settlement of real estate, subject to mortgages, created a trust term, to arise after his decease, for the accumulation of a fixed sum out of the rents each year during a period of twenty-one years, to pay off, either at the end of that period or from time to time during its continuance, as the trustees of the term should think fit, such mortgages as should then be charged on the estate; and he limited the estate by way of remainder expectant on the trust term in strict settlement, the person for the time being entitled to the immediate reversion to be paid the surplus rents. Some years after the death of the settlor, a tenant in tail in possession under the settlement barred the entail, and applied to the court for a declaration that he, as owner of the estate, was entitled to receive the accumulations and to put an end to the trusts of the term. Mortgages to a considerable amount were still outstanding.

Held, that, as, under the deed of settlement, the trust term did not arise until after the death of the settlor, the deed was not a mere arrangement for vesting the property in trustees as agents for the settlor, but constituted a trust in favour of the mortgagees; and that, as the mortgagees, though not parties to, and not named in, the deed, were capable of being ascertained, they were entitled, as cestui que trusts, to insist on and enforce the execution of the trust for accumulation against the applicant or any owner of the estate until they were paid off.

Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, 2 Russ. & My. 451, distinguished.

Per Cotton, L.J.—Even if the mortgagees were not cestui que trusts, no person other than the settlor claiming under the deed of settlement would have any equity to set aside the provisions in the deed relating to accumulation.

1. Execution—Death of high sheriff—Liability of under-sheriff—3 Geo. 1, c. 15, ss. 8, 11.—After the death of a high sheriff, and before the appointment of his successor, the under-sheriff sold goods which had been taken in execution before the death of the high sheriff.

Held, that the under-sheriff was accountable for the proceeds to the execution creditor, and not to the executors of the deceased high sheriff; and that an action for money had and received would lie against him or his executors.

Under a judgment against one of two partners, the sheriff at a sale by auction sold his interest in the partnership to the other partner, and executed an assignment of it to him. The purchase-money was paid by the partner out of the partnership assets.

Held, that the sale must be set aside; and that there was no dissolution of the partnership.

Quære, whether there would have been a dissolution of the partnership if the partner had paid the purchase-money out of his own money.—Helmore v. Smith, C.A. 3—35 Ch. D. 436.

SHIPPING:—

BILL OF LADING—

1. Deviation.—Goods were shipped on board a general ship for carriage from Fiume to Dunkirk. The bill of lading contained the usual exception of perils of the sea, and stated that the goods were shipped "on board The A., now lying at the port of Fiume, bound for Dunkirk, with liberty to call at any ports in any order." The A. proceeded first to Glasgow, and was lost on the voyage thither through a peril of the sea.

Held, that evidence was inadmissible to vary the contract of carriage as contained in the bill of lading; that the voyage to Glasgow was a deviation in excess of the liberty given by such contract; and that the exception contained in the bill of lading did not apply.—Leduc v. Ward, C.A. 537—20 Q. 2. Exception—Accidents of the seas—Damage by rats.—If a cargo was damaged by sea water which entered through a hole made by rats, there is a danger or accident of the seas within the exception in the charter-party and bills of lading.

3. Exception—Perils of the sea—Collision.—Loss of cargo caused by collision is within the words "dangers and accidents of the sea" in the excepted perils in a bill of lading, and is an answer to an action brought for non-delivery of the cargo, if the collision occurs without negligence in the carrying ship.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (35 W. R. 23, 11 P. D. 170) reversed.

4. Indorsement—Collision—Negligence—Contributory negligence—Lights—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, articles 3, 5.—Owners of cargo who have indorsed the bill of lading to a bank to secure advances have sufficient interest in the cargo to maintain an action for damage to cargo by collision for the benefit of all parties proved to be entitled.

A ship carried a light which was visible three miles off, and which, though fixed in the rigging, was not intercepted by the sails or otherwise.

Held, that, there having been no breach of the regulations, there was no presumption of contributory negligence.—The Glamorganshire, P.C.—13 App. 454.

5. Warranty — Seaworthiness — Latent defect — Salvage—Liability of cargo—A steamship having become disabled at sea by the breaking of the flywheel shaft, was taken in tow by another steamship belonging to the same owners, and, after a towage of more than 700 miles, was placed in safety. At the time the services were rendered the disabled steamship was carrying cargo under three different forms of bills of lading, of which one form stated that the vessel was warranted seaworthy only so far as ordinary care could provide; another form provided that the vessel was warranted seaworthy only so far as due care in the appointment of agents, superintendents, pilots, masters, officers, engineers, and crew could insure it; and in the third form there was a stipulation that the shipowners were not to be liable for loss, detention, or damage if arising from latent defects in machinery, even existing at time of shipment, provided all reasonable means had been taken to secure efficiency. In an action by the owners, master, and crew of the salving vessel to recover salvage remuneration for salving the cargo shipped under these forms of bills of lading, and valued at £116,400, the court found that the flywheel of the disabled steamship had broken down from a latent defect, that such latent defect existed when the voyage commenced, but could not have been discovered by the exercise of any reasonable care on the part of the owners, and that the steamship had been seaworthy to the extent required by the bills of lading.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to £1,200 as salvage remuneration for the services rendered to the cargo, and that of this amount £250 must be awarded to the crew of the salving vessel, £50 to her master, and the remainder to the shipowners.—The Laertes, P.D. & A.D. 111—12 P. COLLISION—

7. Compulsory pilotage — Exemption — London district — Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 379, sub-section 3.—A ship which is continually engaged in voyaging from London to the East, and back to London, and then to the North of Europe, and back to London, is, while passing down the Thames on its way to a port in the North of Europe, a ship trading to a place in Europe north of Brest within the meaning of section 379, sub-section 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, as modified by an Order in Council of the 21st of December, 1871, and is exempt from compulsory pilotage.—Courtney v. Cole, Q.B.D. 8—19 Q. B. D. 447; 56 L. J. M. C. 141; 57 L. T. 409.

8. Compulsory pilotage—Exemption—London district—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 379.—The S., a British vessel, on a voyage from Liverpool, not carrying passengers, but bound to, and having on board a cargo consigned to, Hamburg, to which port it was in the habit of trading, came into collision with a barque in the English Channel outside the boundary of the London Pilotage District, and received serious damage. In order to repair the damage, the master, when he arrived off the mouth of the Thames, shaped his course for London, and, off Gravesend, took on board a duly licensed Trinity pilot. Whilst the pilot was in charge The S. came into collision in Half Way Reach with a brig, but was able to proceed to London, where nearly all the cargo was discharged. Of the cargo discharged a portion was sent to Hamburg in another vessel, and the remainder, after a delay of about three weeks, was re-shipped in The S. and taken to Hamburg. An action of damage having been instituted on behalf of the owners of the brig against The S., the owners of The S. raised the defence of compulsory pilotage.

Held, that, at the time of the collision, The S. was trading to a port north of Boulogne within the meaning of section 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and was exempt from compulsory pilotage under the provisions of that section.—The Sutherland, P.D. & A.D. 13—13 P. D. 174; 56 L. J. P. D. & A. 94; 56 L. T. 631.

9. Compulsory pilotage—Negligence of pilot—River—Anchorage—Injury to oyster-bed.—A ship in charge of a compulsory pilot was at high water anchored by the pilot in a river in which were oyster-beds, the existence of which was known to the pilot. It was not the usual and customary place for vessels of the same size to anchor in. At low water the ship grounded and damaged an oyster-bed. On notice of the existence of the oyster-bed being given to the master he took all reasonable means to remove the ship as speedily as possible.

Held, that the act of the pilot in anchoring the ship where he did was negligence which made him liable, but that the ship was not liable.—The Octavia Stella, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 632.

10. Negligence—Crossing ships—River Tyne.—The duty imposed by the River Tyne Navigation Rules upon ships crossing the river not to cause obstruction or damage to other ships does not require a crossing ship in any event to get out of the way of ships going up or down the river, but such ships must take ordinary precautions to avoid collision with crossing ships.—The Thetford, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. 14. Negligence—Lights—River Mersey—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873, s. 17.—A barque which had come up the River Mersey from sea in tow of a steam-tug on the last of the flood was, in the early morning in January, before sunrise, and when nearly abreast of the Canada Basin and in the act of being turned in order to bring the head to the tide, run into almost amidships on the starboard side by a steamship proceeding down the river. To recover for the damage sustained in the collision the owners of the barque instituted an action of damage against the steamship. The green light required to be carried by the barque under the Order in Council of the 24th of June, 1885, relating to the navigation of the Mersey, was so placed as to be obscured by the starboard cathead of the barque from right ahead to considerably less than one-third of a point on the starboard bow; and the stern light required by the same order to be shown from the sternrail had been placed on the deck aft in such a position as not to be properly visible astern. The court found that there had been a reasonable compliance with the Order in Council with respect to the extent of the visibility of the green light of the barque, and that the obscuration of it had nothing to do with the collision; that the neglect to properly show a stern light from the sternrail of the barque could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision; and that the steamship ought to have slackened speed sooner.

Held, that there had been no such infringement of the Order in Council of the 24th of June, 1885, as brought the case within the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1873, and that the barque could not be deemed to blame under that section.—The Fire Queen, P.D. & A.D. 15—12 P. 17. Negligence—River Thames Bye-Laws, article 15—Navigating in anchorage.—A ship which finds all the buoys at the anchorage in Gravesend Reach occupied, and anchors a short distance above the last buoy, does not navigate within the anchorage ground in contravention of article 15 of the River Thames Navigation Bye-laws.—The City of Delhi, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. 18. Sale of ship.—The owners of a vessel seriously damaged in a collision who had issued but had not served a writ in an action of damage in rem instituted against the vessel with which their vessel came into collision, applied, whilst their vessel was under their control and without the territorial jurisdiction of the court, that the court should order a sale of their vessel.

The court refused the application.—The Wexford, P.D. & A.D. 560—13 P. D. 10; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 6; 58 L. T. 28.

19. Towing—Action in rem—Maritime lien.—The plaintiff's ship was sunk through a collision with the defendants' tug, which was towing it. One of the terms of the defendants' contract for towing was that they would not be answerable for damage to any vessel towed by their tugs, which were specified by name, whether occasioned by the negligence of their servants or otherwise. The tug which caused the damage was not specified by name, but had been hired by the defendants under a charter-party, which provided that all damages should be for the charterers' account. The plaintiff knew that the tug had been chartered.

Held, that the plaintiff could not recover damages in an action in rem.—The Tasmania, P.D. & A.D.—13 P. D. 110; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 49.

Co-owners—

20. Charter-party.—A purchaser of a share of a ship during a voyage is liable for the expenses of the voyage, and is entitled to a share of the freight.

Part-owners who have not dissented, though aware that some co-owners have dissented, from the employment of a ship, are liable to bear the expenses, and are entitled to receive the profits, proportionally.

The plaintiffs in an action of restraint, being a minority of co-owners, had given notice to the managing owner that they would not be bound by a new charter-party. The managing owner had then arranged and signed for a charter-party which was afterwards signed by the charterers.

Held, that the charter-party was binding on the plaintiffs.—The Vindobala, P.D. & A.D.—13 App. 42; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 37; 58 L. T. 353.

21. Restraint action—Bail-bond—Cancellation.—Where, in an action of restraint, the defendants put in bail, consenting that execution might issue against the bail if the vessel proceeded against should not safely return to a port within the jurisdiction from as many voyages as it should sail upon before notice should be given by the plaintiffs of the withdrawal of their claims for security, the court, about two years after the execution of the bail-bond, on its being proved that the vessel was in safety within the jurisdiction, and that the defendants had parted with all their interest to third parties, ordered the bail-bond to be cancelled in three days unless the vessel should have passed out of the jurisdiction before it was arrested by a further warrant, otherwise the bond to remain in force until the return of the vessel from the next voyage.—The Vivienne, P.D. & AD. 110—12 P. D. 185; 56 L. J. P. D. & A. 107; 57 L. T. 110.

22. Transfer of share—Bill of sale—Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 10), s. 8.—The managing owners of a steamship, in 1882, agreed to sell to V. one sixty-fourth share, for which he gave them a bill of exchange for £156, and received a receipt as "being one sixty-fourth share in the ship." In 1883 the managing owners sent V. £8 in respect of profits on his share, and a statement of accounts. No bill of sale of the share was ever executed, and the shares of the managing owners were mortgaged at the time of the sale, and they never were in a position to redeem them. Certain owners having paid losses incidental to the working of the ship, sued V. as a co-owner for his proportion of the losses.

Held, that, notwithstanding the receipt by V. of the £8, he was not a co-owner, and the managing owners had no authority to pledge his credit.—The Bonnie Kate, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 203.

DEMURRAGE—

23. Charter-party—Customary manner of loading.—By a charter-party a ship was to proceed to Bilbao, and load in the customary manner in regular steamer turn, where and as ordered by the agent of the freighter, a cargo of iron ore; four hundred tons per working day, weather permitting, to be allowed for loading, and all demurrage over and above the said days at the rate of 12s. 6d. per hour, no demurrage to be paid in case of hands striking work, frosts, or floods, which might hinder the loading of the vessel. The port of Bilbao was on a river where there were a number of wharves, and the ore was brought down by railway from storing places five miles off, and loaded direct from trucks into the ship by shoots, there being no storing places at the wharves. Ships were sometimes loaded while lying out in the river from barges which brought the ore from storing places higher up. The ship was ordered to a wharf to load, and was there loaded under a shoot with ore brought down by rail as above-mentioned. In consequence of heavy rains, and of the men refusing to work from fear of cholera, delay occurred and the ship was detained waiting for cargo.

Held, that neither the state of the weather nor the refusal of the men to work hindered the loading, as both causes of delay operated before the ore arrived at the place of loading, and the only possible mode of loading the ship was not by bringing ore by railway from storing place five miles off.—Stephens v. Harris, C.A.—57 L. J. Q. B. 203.

24. Tonnage rates.—Henderson v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, C.A. 29—19 Q. B. D. 124; 56 L. J. Q. B. 473; 57 L. T. 173—since reversed by the House of Lords.

FREIGHT—

25. Mortgage—Mortgagee in possession.—In 1883 W. mortgaged to the plaintiffs certain shares in a ship. W., the captain and ship's husband, incurred liabilities to the defendants for goods supplied and disbursements. In 1886 the ship was chartered for a voyage from Montreal to Liverpool, the freight being payable one-third at Quebec, and two-thirds on right delivery of the cargo in Liverpool. On arrival of the ship in Liverpool, the plaintiffs took possession and gave notice to the owners of the cargo to pay the freight to them. The defendants obtained judgment against W., and garnishee orders on the receivers of the cargo attaching the freight.

Held, that the defendants had no right to the freight as against the plaintiffs.—Japp v. Campbell, Q.B.D.—57 L. J. Q. B. 79.

JETTISON—

25a. General average.—A steamer carrying, among other things, a large amount of specie on board ran aground and was in a position of danger. The specie was immediately landed by the master of the steamer and conveyed by land to another port. A part of the cargo on board was jettisoned for the purpose of getting the steamer off.

Held, that the losses and expenses incurred in getting the steamer off and the expenses incurred in landing and conveying the specie were not general average to which the owners of the specie were liable to contribute.—Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. v. English Bank of Rio Janeiro, Q.B.D. 105—19 Q. B. D. 361; 57 L. J. Q. B. 31.

MASTER—

26. Bill of lading—Mistake in date—Employment of broker.—The employment of brokers at a foreign port to find a cargo for a ship and settle the terms for carrying it does not give them an implied power to relieve the master, when signing bills of lading, from seeing that they contain the dates of shipment; and the master is liable to the owners for the breach of such duty.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed.—Stumore v. Breen, H.L.—12 App. 698.

MORTGAGE—

27. Arrest—Release.—The court ordered the release of a ship arrested before any money was due by registered mortgagees who had brought an action in rem as mortgagees in possession, the ship not having been so dealt with as to impair the mortgagees' security.—The Blanche, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. T. 592.

NECESSARIES—

28. Lien—Priority—Mortgage—Admiralty Court Act, 1861, s. 4.—A claim in an action for necessaries, including wages paid at the owner's request, is not entitled to priority over a mortgage.—The Lyons, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 818.

SALVAGE—

29. Action in personam—Special agreement.—A steamship which, when laden with cargo, had stranded on a rocky coast and received injury, was towed off the shore by another steamship. Before the salvage services had been rendered, the master of the stranded ship entered into a salvage agreement, whereby he agreed to pay the master of the salving ship or his order, in the event of the stranded ship being got off or coming off the rocks during the continuance of the agreement, £2,000, with an additional sum of £200 for every day the salving steamship remained in attendance. On reaching port the cargo of the salved steamship was discharged, and the salved steamship, before being repaired, was sold for £3,500, £2,200 being deposited in the hands of third parties in London pending the settlement of the claim of the salvors. On the discharge of the cargo of the salved vessel, a bond for general average was given to the shipowners by the owners of the cargo. The owners, master, and crew of the salving vessel brought an action for money due under the above agreement, and for a declaration as to their rights with respect to the deposited sum of £2,200, against the owners of the salved steamship and the persons with whom the £2,200 was deposited. Before the hearing of the action the £2,200 was paid into court.

The court pronounced the sum of £2,200 in court to be due to the plaintiffs for the salvage services rendered, as specified in the agreement; and ordered that, unless an appeal was brought from its decision within a fortnight, the £2,200 brought into court should be paid to the plaintiffs in satisfaction of their claim.—The Prinz Heinrich, P.D. & A.D. 511—13 P. D. 31; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 17; 58 L. T. 593.

30. Appeal—Increase of award.—A collision occurred between The S., while at anchor, and another ship. The tug C. towed The S. clear after an hour's labour, the anchor being slipped. The C. towed The S. till another anchor was brought by other salvors. The value of The S., with its cargo and freight, was £23,000.

The Court of Appeal increased the salvage from £150 to £300.

Decision of Butt, J., varied.—The Star of Persia, C.A.—57 L. T. 839.

31. Contract by master—Liability of shipowner.—An agreement by the master of a vessel in distress to pay salvors a fixed sum is an agreement pledging the credit of the owners so as to make them liable to the salvors for the whole amount, and not merely for such proportion as the value of the ship and freight bears to the value of the cargo.—The Cumbrian, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 205.

STRANDING—

32. Limitation of liability—Priority—Merchant Shipping Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 64.—The owners of a ship which had been lost by stranding paid into court in an action to limit their liability £7,862, being the amount of their statutory liability. This sum was insufficient to meet all the claims in respect of loss of life and loss of goods.

Held, that the court had power to marshall the assets, and that the claimants for loss of goods had no right of priority.—The Victoria, P.D. & A.D.—13 P. D. 125.

TOWING—

33. Collision — Negligence of tug.—A steam-tug towing a ship at sea with a long scope of hawser came into collision at night with another ship, whose owners instituted an action of damage against both the steam-tug and the ship in tow, and claimed to recover the damage sustained in the collision. The statement of claim alleged that the owners of the steam-tug had admitted their liability for the collision, and had obtained an order limiting the amount of such liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts. At the hearing the court found that there had been a bad look-out on the steam-tug; that the ship she had come into collision with had kept its course; and that the ship in tow had contributed to the collision by a bad look-out, and by not porting the helm and checking the course of the steam-tug.

Held, that the ship in tow was liable for the damages proceeded for in the action.

Quære, if the ship in tow would not have been equally liable even if those on board had not by any negligent act contributed to the collision. — The Flying Serpent, The Niobe, P.D. & A.D. 812—13 P. D. 55; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 33.

WAGES—

34. Action in rem—Arrest of ship—Lien.—In an action in rem under the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, the ship from the date of arrest is a security in the hands of the court for the plaintiffs' claim as subsequently determined by the judgment, and this security is not affected by the bankruptcy or liquidation of the shipowners between the date of the arrest and the judgment.—The Cella, C.A. 540—13 P. D. 82; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 55.

WRECK—

35. Expenses of raising—River Thames—Thames Conservancy Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii.) s. 86.—In ascertaining the expenses of weighing or raising a ship under the Thames Conservancy Act, the cost of a special apparatus provided by the Conservators for removing wrecks may be taken into account, and will include interest on capital invested in the apparatus, and repairs, depreciation, and insurance; but, if the work could have been done more cheaply with a less expensive apparatus, the charge must be at a lower rate.—The Harrington, P.D. & A.D.—13 P. D. 48; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 45; 59 L. T. 72.

SLANDER:—

1. Husband and wife—Larceny of wife's property—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 12.—In an action for slander the words complained of were to the effect that the plaintiff robbed his wife of £75 before her removal to a lunatic asylum, and was anxious to get rid of her in order that he might take the remainder of her money.

Held, that, as the words did not impute to the plaintiff that he stole his wife's money while they were living apart, or when he was about to leave or desert her, they were not actionable, since they did not, even under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, impute an indictable offence. — Lemon v. Simmons, Q.B.D. 350—57 L. J. Q. B. 260.

2. Privilege—Parliament — Publication.—Words spoken in Parliament are absolutely privileged, and cannot form the subject of an action for slander.—Dillon v. Balfour, EX.D. (Ir.)—20 L. R. Ir. 601.

SOLICITOR:—

1. Charging order—Bankruptcy—Priority—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 104.—A solicitor had obtained a charging order for his costs under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, from Cave, J., sitting in Bankruptcy, in respect of partnership property recovered or preserved by him in an action for a dissolution of partnership between partners who afterwards became bankrupt. There existed a landlord's claim for rent against the partnership. Before payment of the solicitor's costs, an application was made by the receiver of the partnership assets to Cave, J., as to the application of the assets, and Cave, J., held that the former order, having been made in ignorance of the landlord's claim, must be amended, and the landlord's claim discharged in priority to the solicitor's charge.

Held, on appeal, that the charging order must have priority over the landlord's claim for rent, and that Cave, J., had no jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 104, or otherwise, to vary his first order.

Decision of Cave, J. (reported 36 W. R. 303, 57 Q. B. D. 693), reversed.—Ex parte Brown, In re Suffield, C.A. 584—20 Q. B. D. 693; 58 L. T. 911.

2. Charging order—Husband and wife—Separate estate—Divorce—Alimony—Permanent maintenance—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32—Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-sections 2, 3.—A sum secured to a wife on a dissolution of marriage under section 32 of the Divorce Act, 1857, is alimony, and is property in respect of which the court has jurisdiction to grant the wife's solicitor a charging order for costs under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860; but the court will not grant such an order unless the solicitor makes out a primâ facie case of inability to obtain payment in any other way.

A married woman, having no separate property or only separate property subject to a restraint on anticipation, who institutes divorce proceedings after the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, cannot be deemed under that Act to have entered into a contract, with respect to her separate property, for payment of the costs of her solicitor incurred in the divorce proceedings.

Order of Butt, J., discharged.—Harrison v. Harrison, C.A. 748.

3. Charging order—Priority—Mortgage—London agent—Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28.—During the pendency of a suit for redemption of a mortgage, the plaintiff mortgaged his interest to D., the solicitor for the plaintiff in the suit acting also for D. A dock company had then given notice to take the property under compulsory powers, but no price had been fixed. On the day of the execution of the mortgage to D., the plaintiff by letter directed his solicitor and his London agents to pay off D.'s mortgage out of the first money coming into their hands from the dock company, and the letter was handed to D. with the mortgage deed. The price of the land was afterwards ascertained by arbitration, in which the London agents acted as the plaintiff's solicitors. The price was carried to the credit of the redemption suit, and there was a balance after paying off the original mortgage. The plaintiff's solicitors and his London agents applied for a charging order on the fund for their costs of the redemption action and the arbitration.

Held, (1) that the solicitor, having acted for D. as well as the plaintiff, was not thereby disentitled to a charging order; (2) that the solicitor, having handed over the plaintiff's letter to D., could not claim for the charging order priority over his mortgage; (3) that the London agents were not entitled to the benefit of the charging order.

Order of Stirling, J., varied.—Macfarlane v. Lister, C.A.—37 Ch. D. 88; 57 L. J. Ch. 92; 58 L. T. 201.

4. Lien—Priority—Attachment—Garnishee order—Costs.—The costs of an interlocutory application cannot be attached by a judgment creditor in prejudice of the lien of the party's solicitor.—Cormick v. Ronayne, EX.D. (Ir.)—22 L. R. Ir. 140.

5. Mortgage—Fraud—Death of solicitor—Following assets.—A solicitor invested money of a client in valueless mortgages and afterwards died.

Held, that the client could follow any assets in the hands of the executors of the deceased which he could identify as having been received from himself.—Dickson v. Murray, CH.D. STI., J.—57 L. T. 223.

6. Negligence—Investment—Mortgage—Breach of trust—Statute of Limitations.—Where money is received by a solicitor for a client to be invested on a particular mortgage selected by the client, or on a mortgage to be selected by the solicitor, but subject to the client's approval, the solicitor, in the absence of special circumstances, is not responsible, on the footing of a trustee, for the sufficiency of the security, but is only liable as a solicitor for negligence, if proved, and in that case is not excluded from the benefit of the Statute of Limitations; but where the money is received to be invested at the solicitor's discretion, and the client takes no part in the selection, the solicitor is liable, on the footing of a trustee, if the security turns out to have been insufficient and such as a trustee would not have been justified in investing on.

There is nothing improper in a solicitor advising a client who owes him money to sell or mortgage property and allow the solicitor to receive the purchase or mortgage-money and retain out of it the amount owing to himself from the client, and it makes no difference that the purchase or mortgage-money is paid or advanced by another client acting upon the solicitor's advice, but such a transaction, if challenged, will be closely scanned to see whether the solicitor has acted in good faith and with due regard to his client's interests.

A piece of land included in a mortgage for £5,000 was sold, and the mortgagee, being advised in good faith by her solicitor that the remaining land was a sufficient security for her money, and being reluctant to break into her investment, allowed the price to be received by the owners of a second mortgage, in which the solicitor himself had an indirect interest, as being responsible to clients for the money advanced on it. The security turned out insufficient for the first mortgage.

Held, that the solicitor had not by his conduct constituted himself a trustee for his client, the first mortgagee, so as to be liable to make good to her the loss of the money.

7. Remuneration—Bankruptcy—Mortgage—Sale by official receiver—Remuneration Order, 1882, s. 2, schedule 1.—Certain property of a bankrupt which was subject to a mortgage was sold by the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy, the mortgagee executing a reconveyance, and his debt being paid out of the purchase-money.

Held, that a percentage on the whole amount received for the property was properly allowed by the taxing master to the solicitors who acted for the official receiver in carrying out the sale.—Ex parte Harris, In re Gallard, Q.B.D., BANKY. 592—21 Q. B. D. 38; 57 L. J. Q. B. 528; 59 L. T. 147.

8. Remuneration—Election—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 80—Payment into court.—Where money is paid into court under section 80 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the solicitor for the vendor may entitle himself to detailed charges, provided that he signifies his election "before undertaking the business."—In re Bridewell Hospital, CH.D. CHL., J.—57 L. T. 155.

9. Remuneration—Interest—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), s. 5—Remuneration Order, 1882, clause 7.—By clause 7 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, "a solicitor may charge interest at four per cent. per annum on his disbursements and costs, whether by scale or otherwise, from the expiration of one month from demand from the client."

A solicitor delivered a bill of costs to his client, but without any express demand of payment or claim for interest. The bill was taxed, the amount allowed on taxation paid, and the solicitor then claimed interest.

Held, that the sending in of the bill constituted a demand within the meaning of clause 7, and that he was entitled to such interest.—Blair v. Cordner (2), Q.B.D. 109.

10. Remuneration — Lease — Rent — Premium—Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule 1, part 2, r. 5.—A firm of solicitors were employed by a lessor to prepare for him a lease of certain property for twenty-one years to a company, the consideration for the lease being a rent of £80 and the issue of 400 shares of the nominal value of £10. None of the company's shares had been sold, so that no market value had been placed upon them; and 200 of the 400 shares had not been issued. The solicitors charged the scale fee on the rent of £80, and also the scale fee for deducing title, perusing and completing deed as upon a premium of £4,000, the amount of the nominal value of the 400 shares.

Held, that they were not entitled to make the latter charge, as the value of the shares could not be estimated, and rule 5, part 2, schedule 1, of the Remuneration Order, 1882, did not apply to such a case.—In re Hastie, CH.D. NOR., J. 572.

11. Remuneration—Mortgage—Investigating title—Taxation after payment—Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule 1, part 1.—R., the lessee of property, with an option of purchase, told E., the lessor's solicitor, that he intended to purchase the property, and should require some money on mortgage. E. put R. into communication with M., and a loan was arranged between them, E. taking no part in the negotiation. A week after the date fixed for the completion of the purchase and mortgage, E. sent R.'s solicitor a bill "for negotiating and preparing mortgage as per scale, £20," and demanding completion on the following day. On the day of completion R. and his solicitor objected to E.'s charge; but afterwards R.'s solicitor said that, if E. would accept R.'s cheque and hold it for a week before paying it in, R.'s solicitor would advise R. not to dispute E.'s charge. This was agreed to. R.'s cheque was dishonoured on presentation, and the amount recovered after an action had been brought.

Held, on a summons by R. for taxation after payment, that E. had overcharged, as he had not negotiated the loan nor investigated for the mortgage, and was not entitled to fees for that work, which was included in the charge of £20; and that R. would have had a right to taxation after payment, but was bound by the agreement not to dispute E.'s charge in consideration of E.'s taking R.'s cheque and holding it for a week.—In re Eley, CH.D. NOR., J. 96—37 Ch. D. 40; 56 L. J. Ch. 905; 57 L. T. 253.

12. Remuneration—Mortgage—Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule 1, rule 2.—Under a provision in a will the testator's sons took the real estate at a valuation, and took over the assets and liabilities of the testator's business, giving the trustees a mortgage to secure the purchase-money the same solicitor acted for all parties.

Held, that the solicitor could not charge full vendors' and purchasers' and mortgagors' and mortgagees' costs.—In re Keeping, CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. T. 672.

13. Remuneration—Vendor and purchaser—Auction—Administration action—Conduct of sale—Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule 1, part 1, r. 11.—A sale by auction of real property was made under an order of court in an administration action, and the conduct of the sale was given to the plaintiff, whose solicitor personally performed part of the duties of conducting the sale, the auctioneer merely offering the property in the auction room. The auctioneer was paid by the client.

Held, that the solicitor was not entitled, under the Remuneration Order, schedule 1, part 1, r. 11, to scale fees for his services as auctioneer, and that the existence of a local custom to the contrary did not affect this rule.—Sykes v. Sykes, CH.D. CHI., J. 234.

14. Remuneration—Vendor and purchaser—Auction—Conducting fee—Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule 1, part 1, r. 11.—Property was put up for sale by public auction and sold in two lots. The auctioneer's commission was paid by the vendor. The solicitor employed by the vendor in connection with the sale charged the scale fee provided by part 1 of schedule 1 to the Remuneration Order for "deducing title," &c., and he also made various charges for work done by him previous to the sale, for which he claimed to be entitled under clause 2 (c) of the order. The taxing master allowed the scale fee, but disallowed the other items, considering himself bound by In re Emanuel, 34 W. R. 613, 33 Ch. D. 40.

Held, that the solicitor was entitled, under clause 2 (c) to charge, in addition to the scale fee, for deducing title for work properly done by him in connection with the sale for which the auctioneer had not been paid.—In re Faulkner, CH.D. NOR., J. 59—36 Ch. D. 566; 56 L. J. Ch. 1011; 57 L. T. 342.

15. Remuneration—Vendor and purchaser—Auction—Conducting fee—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, s. 2—Remuneration Order, schedule 1, part 1, r. 11.—A solicitor employed by the vendor in connection with a sale of property is only entitled to be paid in respect of business connected with the sale the scale fees prescribed in part 1 of schedule 1 to the Remuneration Order; and therefore, where the sale is by public auction, and the commission to the auctioneer is paid by the vendor, the solicitor is only entitled to be paid the "deducing fee," and is not entitled to be paid remuneration in respect of other business done by him in connection with the sale.

In re Faulkner, 36 W. R. 59, 36 Ch. D. 566, overruled.—In re Newbould, C.A. 161—20 Q. B. D. 204; 57 L. J. Q. B. 41; 58 L. T. 334.

16. Remuneration—Vendor and purchaser—Auction—Scale fee—Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule 1, part 1, r. 11.—Solicitors employed to sell property by auction where the auctioneer's commission was paid by the client delivered a bill in which they charged the scale fee for conducting the sale and deducing the title, and mentioned items of solicitors' work not included in the scale fee for deducing the title. The taxing master disallowed the fee for conducting the sale because of the auctioneer's charge being paid by the client, and did not allow any fee for items mentioned in the bill of solicitors' work not included in the scale fee for deducing the title, on the ground that the bill was made up on a wrong footing and could not be altered by adding charges.

Held, that the taxing master was right in disallowing the scale fee for conducting the sale, but that he ought to have allowed the solicitors a quantum meruit for solicitors' work done by them and mentioned in their bill, and not covered by the scale fee for deducing the title.—In re Peace, CH.D. NOR., J. 61—57 L. T. 753.

17. Remuneration—Vendor and purchaser—Condition of sale—Lease—Mortgage—Discretion of taxing master—Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule 2, r. 2.—The plaintiffs in an administration action obtained an order to sell leasehold property, the mortgagees of which were not parties to the action, and to pay the purchase-money into court. The mortgagees had no knowledge of the order, but draft particulars and conditions of sale were sent for their perusal. The mortgagees concurred in the sale and approved the conditions on condition that their claim should be discharged.

Held, that the taxing master had discretion to disallow the fees of one shilling per folio for the reading of the conditions of sale by the mortgagees' solicitors—Rees v. Rees, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 69.

18. Remuneration — Vendor and purchaser — Election—Notice—Co-trustees—Remuneration Order, 1882, rr. 6, 8.—The notice of election under rule 6 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, as to remuneration for conveyancing business arising in an action, must be given by the solicitor before he undertakes such conveyancing business. After having done any work in the matter which would properly be covered by the scale charge—e.g., discussing with the client the mode of sale and questions relating to the title—it is too late for him to elect.

19. Retainer—Interpleader issue.—A retainer given to a solicitor to take proceedings to recover a debt does not give him authority to engage in interpleader proceedings, without special instructions, after judgment has been obtained and execution issued.—James v. Bicknell, Q.B.D. 280—20 Q. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE:—

1. Damages—Ord. 34, r. 2.—Since the Judicature Acts the plaintiff in an action for specific performance may obtain damages without showing that he is entitled to specific performance.—Elmore v. Pirrie, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 333.

2. Lease—Agreement to accept—Damages.—It was agreed between A. and B. that B. should make an agreement with M., who was A.'s landlord, for a lease at a specified rent on such terms and with such covenants as M. should approve, and that A. should surrender his lease on the new lease being granted. B. refused to carry out the agreement.

Held, that A. was entitled to damages from B. for breach of contract.

Judgment of Kekewich, J. (36 W. R. 267, 36 Ch. D. 695), affirmed.—Foster v. Wheeler, C.A.—38 Ch. D. 131; 59 L. T. 15.

3. Lease—Renewal—Letter to agent—Statute of Frauds.—A. wrote to his landlord's agents, asking for a renewal of his lease, and offering a premium. The landlord wrote a letter to his agents, in which he declined A.'s offer, but added:—"If A. is very urgent, I consent to grant him a lease for twenty-one years at £50 a year and a premium of £100." A. accepted this offer.

Held, that A. was entitled to a new lease for the same term as before, at £50 a year, on payment of the premium.

Judgment of Kekewick, J., reversed.—Wood v. Aylward, C.A.—58 L. T. 662.

3a. Vendor and purchaser—Auction—Bidding—Fraud of third parties.—At an auction for the sale of some mortgaged property sold by order of the court, a person, acting in the interest of the mortgagor, and having no intention of purchasing the property, and no means of doing so if it were sold to him, bid for it, and ran up the price considerably above the reserve, when it was knocked down to the defendant. The plaintiffs, the mortgagees, who had the conduct of the sale, had no knowledge of the dishonest bidding, and were not parties to it.

Held, that the vendors could enforce the contract.—Union Bank of London v. Munster, CH.D. KEK., J. 72—37 Ch. D. 51; 57 L. J. Ch. 124; 57 L. T. 877.

4. Vendor and purchaser—Default—Forfeiture of deposit—Costs.—In a vendor's action to enforce a contract to purchase real estate, the plaintiff, by his statement of claim, claimed specific performance, or, in the alternative, a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to forfeit the deposit and resell the property. The purchaser had accepted the title, but had failed to complete on the day fixed for completion. There was a condition empowering the vendor to forfeit the deposit and resell the property in case the purchaser failed to comply with any of the conditions of sale. The defendant had not appeared to the writ.

Held, that, if the writ had claimed such an alternative declaration as was asked by the statement of claim, the declaration might be made; but that the order should direct the plaintiff to pay the costs of the action.—Kingdon v. Kirk, CH.D. NOR., J. 430—37 Ch. D. 141; 57 L. J. Ch. 328; 58 L. T. 382.

5. Vendor and purchaser—Right of way—Sewers—Damages.—A purchaser of land agreed within a specified time to grant to the vendor a right of way and to make a road and sewers leading to other land of the vendor. The purchaser was unable to grant the right of way or make the road and sewers till after the expiration of the specified period, and the other land consequently remained unprofitable to the vendor.

Held, that the vendor was entitled to specific performance, but not to damages.—Rowe v. School Board for London, CH.D. KEK., J.—36 Ch. D. 619; 57 L. T. 182.

STAMP:—

1. Conveyance—Consideration—Railway company—Ad valorem duty—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 19), s. 48—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97) s. 70.—The Stamp Act, 1870, provides in the schedule for an ad valorem duty on every "conveyance on sale of any property," to be calculated upon the "amount or value of the consideration for the sale," and, by section 70, "conveyance on sale" includes "every instrument . . whereby any property, upon the sale thereof, is legally or equitably transferred or vested in the purchaser." By section 48 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the jury shall deliver their verdict as to the "value of lands to be purchased."

A railway company gave notice to the owners of certain saw-mills of their intention to purchase their premises compulsorily. A jury summoned under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, assessed a certain sum as the value of the land and buildings and £9,500 as compensation for loss of business. The conveyance to the railway company recited these assessments.

Held, that the total sum, including the £9,500 assessed by the jury, was the value of the lands to be purchased, and, as part of the consideration for the sale, was liable to the ad valorem duty.—Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., H.L. 241—12 App. 315; 57 L. T. 570.

2. Promissory note—Life insurance—Surrender of policy—Stamp Act, 1870, s. 49.—An instrument which was called a policy of insurance and guaranteed to the assured the payment of £100 on the 18th of May, 1967, provided that, if the assured should be desirous at any time of surrendering the policy, he should be allowed the surrender value thereof as on the 18th day of May last preceding the date of his notice to surrender, such value to be fixed according to certain tables for the time being in force with reference to surenders.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, 36 W. R. 474, 20 Q. B. D. 645), that the instrument was not chargeable with stamp duty as a promissory note.—Mortgage Insurance Corporation v

Inland Revenue Commissioners, C.A. 833—21 Q. B. D. 352; 57 L. J. Q. B. 468.

STOCKBROKER.—See PRINCIPAL AND AGENT, 2.

STOP ORDER.—See MORTGAGE, 4.

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU:—

Delivery—End of transit.—Certain goods having been purchased in England, the purchaser sent a consignment note to the vendors "to consign the ten hogsheads hollow ware to The D., to Melbourne, loading in the East India Docks here." The goods were accordingly delivered by the vendors to carriers for shipment on board The D. The vendors having heard of the insolvency of the purchasers, telegraphed to the carriers to stop the goods, but this telegram arrived too late to prevent the goods being shipped on board The D., which then sailed for Melbourne. The vendors before the arrival of the ship at Melbourne, gave the shipowners notice that they claimed the goods.

Held, that the transit was not at an end until the arrival of the goods at Melbourne, and that the notice to stop was good.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (36 W. R. 185, 19 Q. B. D. 553), affirmed.—Bethell v. Clark, C.A. 611—20 Q. B. D. 615; 57 L. J. Q. B. 302.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS, LAW of:—

Petition of right—Tort—Seashore—Right of access. By the law of the Straits Settlements the Crown can be sued in tort.

The owner of land abutting on the seashore has the same right of access to the foreshore as a riparian owner on the banks of a navigable river.—Attorney-General of Straits Settlements v. Wemyss, P.C.—13 App. 192; 57 L. J. P. C. 62; 58 L. T. 358.

SUCCESSION DUTY:—

Successor—Purchaser—Tenancy for life—Fund in court.—T. by his will devised land at F., held under leases for lives, of which R.'s was the last, upon trust for R. for his life, with remainders over. B. purchased from R. his life interest in the lands, and then purchased the reversion in fee of the lands. Part of the land was taken under statutory powers for public purposes, and a sum was paid into court as purchase and compensation money. B. applied for payment out to him of the fund in court, but it was held that B., having bought from the tenant for life, was only entitled to the income of the fund in court during R.'s life, and was a trustee of the corpus for the persons entitled under the testator's will, subject to a lien for the price paid for the reversion. R. died, and S. became entitled, under the will, to the fund in court.

Held, that, although B. would not have been liable to pay succession duty, S. was liable to pay succession duty on R.'s death, as the equity of S. to be substituted for B. was by virtue of the testator's will, and that the effect was the same as if there had been a trust in the will for the purchase out of his estate of the reversion in fee of the land.—De Rechberg v. Beeton, CH.D. CHI., J. 682—38 Ch. D. 132; 59 L. T. 56.

TRADE-MARK:—

1. Infringement — Injunction. — F. sought to restrain C. and V. from using the name "R. Concerts," or from representing themselves as owners of the undertaking known by that name, or from representing that they were carrying on the "R. Concerts" in succession to F.'s series; and to restrain V. from acting as agent for C. F. alleged that he engaged R. to conduct concerts, and had originated the "R. Concerts"; and that no concert had ever been given under that name except by him. C. had announced a series of "R. Concerts," and V., notwithstanding a written agreement to act as F.'s agent, had held himself out as the agent of C. R. had declined to act any longer as F.'s conductor.

Held, that F. was entitled to an injunction.—Franks v. Chappell, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 141.

2. Infringement—Misrepresentation by plaintiff.—The plaintiffs, who were manufacturers of and dealers in cigars in England, imported cigars made of Havannah tobacco and manufactured in Germany. The plaintiff sold the cigars in England in boxes with a label containing their trade-mark, the words "La Pureza," and a pictorial representation of an Indian woman and two boys holding shields and a background. On one shield were depicted the arms of Spain, and on the other those of Havannah. In the trade-mark as registered the shields were blank. A smaller label contained the lithographed signature of "R. R." On each box were branded the words "La Pureza" and "Habana." "La Pureza" was an old disused brand of Havannah cigars, and there was no known person of the name of "R. R." The defendants used similar marks.

Held, that the plaintiffs, having falsely represented their cigars as manufactured in Havannah, could not maintain an action for infringement of their trade-mark.—Newman v. Pinto, C.A.—57 L. T. 31.

3. Rectification of register—Deceptive mark—Patents, Designs, and Trade-marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 67.—Y. & Co. registered a trade-mark for fermented liquors, consisting of three triangles, two placed on a third, the space in the centre being blank. B. subsequently registered another mark for bottled beer, consisting of three triangles interlaced, the space in the centre containing a stag's head.

Held, that the mark subsequently registered was calculated to deceive, and that so much of it as consisted of the triangular arrangement must be expunged from the register.—In re Seigel's Trade-mark, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 247.

4. Rectification of register—Words — Combination with other words—Trade-Marks Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 91), s. 10.—In 1877 P. & Co. were registered as proprietors of a trade-mark for medicine, which consisted of the words "Pain Killer," and in respect of which they claimed user for forty years before registration. L. applied for removal of the name from the register, on the ground that the words had been frequently used in combination with other words.

Held, that the words were not a proper mark for registration under section 10 of the Trade-Marks Act, 1875.—In re Harbord, C.A.—58 L. T. 695.

4a. Registration—Fancy word—Infringement—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 64.—In 1883 the plaintiff invented a game called "Reversi," which he registered as a trade-mark in 1887. In 1886 the defendant advertised a game called "Annex," which the plaintiff alleged to be an imitation of his own invention. In 1888 the defendant added the words "a game of reverses." The word "Reversi" is the name of an old French game at cards.

Held, that "Reversi" was not a fancy word, and ought not to have been registered as a trade-mark, and that the defendant had not been guilty of an infringement.—Waterman v. Ayres, C.A.—59 L. T. 17.

5. Registration—Fancy word—Old mark—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 64, sub-sections 1 (c), 3; ss. 67, 72.—H. & Co. registered under the Trade-Marks Act, 1875, two trade-marks in respect of coffee as marks which had been used by them before the passing of that Act, and thereby obtained protection in respect of all goods in that class till the passing of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, since which the protection applied to coffee only. The marks had never been used for anything but coffee.

Held, that the former registration gave no right to have the marks registered under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, as old marks for goods other than coffee, although in the same class; and that, with respect to such goods, they must be treated as new marks, and must comply with the provisions of the later Act.

The trade-marks consisted of—first, an oblong label divided into three equal and parallel stripes, coloured red, white, and blue respectively (the colours being shown, for the purposes of the former registration, by shading with dark lines), but with no dividing lines between the stripes; and, secondly, the words "red, white, and blue" printed across the label.

Held, that the only distinction in the device was the use of the colour; that the Act treated colour as an accident, so that the device must be something distinctive independently of colour; that the words "red, white, and blue" were not "fancy words not in common use"; and that registration must be refused.—In re Hanson's Trade-Mark, CH.D. KAY, J. 134—37 Ch. D. 112; 57 L. J. Ch. 173; 57 L. T. 859.

6. Registration — Fancy word — "Sanitas" — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 64.—The word "Sanitas" is not a fancy word, and cannot be registered as a trade-mark for toilet soap and disinfecting fluid.—In re Sanitas Co., CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 166.

TRADE UNION:—

Illegality—Restraint of trade—Trade Union Act, 1870 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31), s. 23.—One of the rules of a society established for the protection of a particular trade provided that no member of the society should employ any traveller, carman, or outdoor employé who has left the service of another member, without the consent in writing of his late employer, until after the expiration of two years from his leaving such service.

Held, that the rule imposed an unreasonable restraint on trade, and was, therefore, bad.

Semble, a rule properly framed, preventing one member from injuring another by improperly acquiring information from a servant, would have been valid.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.—Mineral Water Bottle Trade Protection Society v. Booth, C.A. 274—36 Ch. D. 465; 57 L. T. 573.

TRUSTEE:—

1. Appointment — Contract by lunatic — Lease — Vesting order—Covenant for quiet enjoyment.—The plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendant under which the defendant was to grant leases to the plaintiff in the form of a draft lease, which contained an express covenant for quiet enjoyment. Before the leases were granted the defendant became of unsound mind.

Held, that an order might be made vesting the legal term in the plaintiff pursuant to the contract, but that the order would not give him the benefit of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. — Cowper v. Harmer, CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. J. Ch. 460; 57 L. T. 714.

2. Appointment—New trustee—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 31—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 38.—One of three trustees appointed by the court under section 38 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, having gone to reside abroad, the court, under the same section, appointed a new trustee in his place, for the purposes of the Act. —In re Kane, M.R. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 112.

3. Appointment—New trustee—Death of sole trustee —Vesting order—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), ss, 32, 34—Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 30.—The sole trustee of freehold land, appointed by will, died in the lifetime of the testator. The testator's heirs-at-law died intestate after the Conveyancing Act, 1881, had come into operation, and there was no legal personal representative of her estate. A petition, which was served on the testator's heir, was presented for the appointment of new trustees and a vesting order.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to appoint new trustees and to make an order vesting the trust property in the new trustees for such estate as was vested in the heirs-at-law at the time of her death.—In re Williams's Trusts, CH.D. NOR., J. 100—56 L. J. Ch. 1088; 56 L. T. 884.

4. Appointment—New trustee — Lunacy—Consent —Verification—Affidavit—Ord. 38, r. 19*a*.—On a petition in the Chancery Division as well as in Lunacy the signature of a proposed trustee to his consent to act may be verified as provided by ord. 38, r. 19*a*, and the old practice requiring an affidavit need not be followed.—In re Hume, LUN. 84—35 Ch. D. 457; 56 L. J. Ch. 1020; 56 L. T. 351.

5. Appointment — New trustee — Private Act — Approbation of court—Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 31. —A private Act, in 1869, enacted that section 27 of Lord Cranworth's Act should be deemed to apply to the trusteeship of the M. estates, "provided that every new trustee of the said estates shall be appointed with the approbation of the Court of Chancery." In 1886 a deed was executed by the trustees appointing new trustees under the power vested in them by statute, and contained the usual declaration vesting the estates in the new trustees; but the appointment was not made with the approbation of the court.

Held, that the deed must be construed as if the special provision contained in the private Act had formed part of Lord Cranworth's Act: that, as Lord Cranworth's Act had been repealed, the court could not add the special provision to the general power of appointment given by the Conveyancing Act, 1881; and that the new trustees were properly appointed.—In re Lloyd's Trusts, CH.D. NOR., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 246.

6. Appointment — New trustee—Vesting order—Jurisdiction — Trustee Act, 1850, s. 10—Trustee Extension Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 55), s. 8.—One of two trustees was sentenced to penal servitude for felony, and the Lancaster Palatine Court appointed a new trustee jointly with the other trustee, and made an order vesting in them the land within the jurisdiction of that court. A petition was then presented to the Chancery Division for an order vesting the rest of the trust property in the same trustees.

Held, that no vesting order could be made under section 8 of the Trustee Extension Act, 1852, but that the court had jurisdiction to make a vesting order under section 10 of the Trustee Act, 1850.—In re Hulme's Trusts, CH.D. CHL., J.—57 L. T. 13.

7. Appointment — New trustee—Will—Beneficial interest.—On a petition to appoint a new trustee under a will in the place of a deceased trustee, the court directed the appointment of one of several persons beneficially interested in the testator's estate, the testator having appointed beneficiaries as trustees, and having empowered the beneficiaries, on the death or retirement of the trustees, to appoint one or more persons to supply the vacancy.—Tempest v. Lord Camoys, CH.D. CHL., J.—58 L. T. 221.

8. Appointment—Remuneration—Trustees resident out of the jurisdiction—Trustee Act, 1850, ss. 32, 34—Trustee Extension Act, 1852, s. 9.—Under a settlement of real estate situate within the jurisdiction, the trustees had a power of sale with the consent of the tenant for life, the proceeds to be invested in the purchase of land. A power of appointing new trustees was vested in the surviving or continuing trustees or the heirs or assigns of the last surviving or continuing trustee. The last surviving trustee died in 1874 without making any devise of trust estates. His heir had not been heard of for ten years. All the cestui que trusts were, and had for many years been, resident out of the jurisdiction, and knew no one within the jurisdiction but A. who would consent to become trustee. A. had for many years managed the estate and received the rents as agent at a commission of five per cent. on the annual rental, and declined to be appointed trustee except at the same rate of remuneration. Two of the proposed new trustees, B. and C., were resident out of the jurisdiction.

On the application of all the cestui que trusts, some of whom were infants, and of A., B., and C., the court appointed A., B., and C. to be trustees, A. to manage the estate at a commission of five per cent. on the annual rental, and B. and C. undertaking, in the event of A.'s death, not to appoint a new trustee resident out of the jurisdiction without applying to the court.—In re Freeman's Trusts, CH.D. STL., J. 71—37 Ch. D. 148; 57 L. J. Ch. 160; 57 L. T. 798.

9. Appointment — Separate trusts — Additional trustee—Trustee Act, 1850, s. 32—Conveyancing Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 39), s. 5.—The sole trustee under a will was desirous of being discharged from the trusts of a particular fund. He declined to appoint new trustees, but expressed an intention of paying the fund into court.

The court declined to appoint additional trustees in respect of the separate fund.—In re Nesbitt's Trusts, C.A. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 509.

10. Appointment — Separate trusts — Petition—Trustee Act, 1850, s. 32—Conveyancing Act, 1882, s. 5.—The court has power, under the Trustee Act, 1850, to allow trustees to retire from a part of the trusts, and to appoint new trustees of that part whenever it is expedient so to do, this power being independent of that conferred by section 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882.

12. Breach of trust—Acquiescence—Indemnity.—A trustee who distributes a trust fund among strangers at the request of a beneficiary, from whom he takes a covenant of indemnity, cannot recover under the covenant for the loss of a beneficial interest under the fund to which he has since become entitled.

A. was sole trustee of a fund held in trust for B. for life, then for B.'s wife for life, and if she predeceased B. in trust for such person as she should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for her next of kin. A., at the request of B. and his wife, raised £5,000 out of the fund, and paid £1,000 to each of D.'s adult daughters, and £1,000 to D. in trust for his infant daughter, B. covenanting with A. to indemnify him against all consequences of the distribution. B. survived his wife, who died intestate, and whose next of kin were A. and D. A.'s executor sued B.'s executor to compel him to replace the £5,000.

Held, that B.'s covenant was to indemnify A. only against demands on him for breach of trust, and that the action must be dismissed.

Judgment of Kay, J., reversed.—Evans v. Benyon, C.A.—37 Ch. D. 329; 58 L. T. 700.

13. Breach of trust—Sale of property—Repurchase by nominee—Burden of proof.—R. devised his property, including S. Farm, to A., B., and C., upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds amongst several persons, A. being one. By deed dated the 24th of March, 1854, A., B., and C., as trustees, conveyed S. Farm to W. for £1,814 17s. 2d. In June, 1854, W. reconveyed the farm to B. for £1,831 9s. 7d. In July, 1870, B. purchased with his own moneys the L. property for £787 11s., and in 1874 he sold S. Farm and X. to M. for £9,587 10s.

Held, that the purchase by W. as nominee of B. vitiated the repurchase by B., and that his representatives must account for the profits made by the different dealings with the trust property.

Held, also, that the burden of proof lies on the plaintiff in a case of repurchase by a trustee where the facts are known to both parties.—Postlethwaite v. Rickman, CH.D. KEK., J. 808—59 L. T. 53.

14. Breach of trust—Solicitor—Costs—Constructive trust.—In order to preclude a solicitor from accepting from a trustee payment, out of the trust estate, of costs incurred in the administration of the trust estate, it must be conclusively shown that the solicitor, at the time of receiving such payment, had knowledge that the trustee had been guilty of such a breach of trust as to incapacitate him from resorting to the trust estate for the payment of such costs.

15. Chapel—Presbyterian Church of England—Dissenters' Chapels Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 45), s. 2.—A chapel was conveyed in 1766 to trustees upon trust to permit the premises to be used as "a meeting-house for Protestant Dissenters of the Presbyterian or Independent denomination to worship in." A series of ministers had been appointed and officiated in the chapel since that date, some of them being Presbyterians, others Independents; but since the year 1800 Independent ministers alone had been pastors of the congregation, the defendant A., who was appointed in 1864, being an Independent. In 1879 and 1880, at meetings of the chapel congregation, a majority of the members decided to apply for the admission of the congregation to fellowship with the Presbyterian Church of England, a body formed in 1876 by the union of certain religious bodies in England holding Presbyterian tenets, and the congregation was eventually so admitted. By the constitution of this body, any congregation admitted to its fellowship lost the power of absolute control over its own affairs in certain particulars. The plaintiff was a member of the congregation at the time of the application to the English Presbyterian Church, and objected to joining that Church, and brought this action, claiming that, the chapel having been used for more than twenty-five years for worship in accordance with Independent principles and usage, it could not now be used for worship in accordance with the usages of the Presbyterian Church.

Held, that the Dissenters' Chapels Act, 1844, was available only as a defence against attempted alteration after a period of twenty-five years, and not as a means to compel the continuance of any particular religious usages.

Held, also, that the constitution of the Presbyterian Church of England was such that it would be contrary to the trusts of the deed of the chapel for it to be transferred to that Church, the deed contemplating the control of the chapel affairs by no other body than the congregation meeting there, and that the plaintiff's claim must succeed.—Attorney-General v. Anderson, CH.D. REK., J. 714—57 L. J. Ch. 543; 58 L. T. 726.

16. Contribution—Indemnity.—A., B., and C., who were trustees, invested money on insufficient security. In a writ by the cestuis que trust it was declared that A., B. and her husband, and the estate of C., who was dead, were liable to make good the loss. The amount was afterwards paid into court by the trustees of a settlement which comprised part of C.'s estate. The trustees sued A. for one-third contribution, but did not realise anything. They then sued B. and her husband for half contribution.

Held, that the trustees were entitled to recover from A. and her husband.—Bacon v. Camphausen, CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. T. 851.

17. Indemnity—Power of appointment—Default—Resulting trust.—A. and B. agreed that the income of money invested in their joint names in shares in a company, but in fact supplied by A., should go to A. for her life, and afterwards to B. for his life, and the principal then to such charities as A. should by will appoint.

Held, on failure of such appointment, after the determination of the life estates, that there was a resulting trust of the principal in favour of A. B. having survived A., and the company having gone into liquidation, B.'s executor, being liable in the winding up, sued A.'s executors for an indemnity before any call had been made on him.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to the indemnity.—Hobbs v. Wayet, CH.D. REK., J. 73—36 Ch. D. 256; 56 L. J. Ch. 849; 57 L. T. 225.

18. Investment—Consols—National Debt Conversion Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 2), ss. 8, 26, 27.—The trustees of a fund were by a will directed to invest the fund in £3 per Cent. Consols, but without power to vary or change the investment when made, and out of the income of the Consols to pay certain annuities, and after the deaths of the annuitants the trust funds were directed to go over. The fund was duly invested. The annuities were not charged on the corpus.

Held, that sections 8 and 26 of the National Debt Conversion Act, 1888, authorised trustees to exchange £3 per Cent. Consols for the new stock, and that section 27 authorised trustees to sell any stock converted or exchanged by virtue of that Act, and to invest the proceeds in any of the securities for the time being authorised for the investment of cash under the control of the High Court of Justice; and that the trustees of the will were justified in selling the £3 per Cent. Consols representing the trust funds and investing the proceeds of such sale in any of the securities now authorised for the investment of cash under the control of the High Court.—In re Tuckett's Trusts, CH.D. CHI., J. 542—57 L. J. Ch. 760.

19. Investment—Income—Payment to trustees—Form of order.—It is not desirable, as a general rule, to order income to be paid to trustees, "or either of them," according to the form in Seton on Decrees, p. 88, s. 4, No. 2.

In re Clinton, 8 W. R. 492, not followed.—Carr v. Carr, CH.D. REK., J. 668.

20. Judgment—Interest.—A person who has been declared by the judgment of the court to be a trustee for a sum of money received by him will be liable to pay interest at five per cent. on such sum.—Glen Valley Railway Co. v. McCarthy, V.C. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 134.

21. Mortgage—Vesting order—Jurisdiction—Trustee Act, 1850, s. 9.—In 1881 a house was mortgaged to A. for £350. In 1887 A. transferred the mortgage to B. for £385, which sum was provided by D. and H. The transfer was to B. in trust for D. and H., but there was no declaration of trust. B. became a bankrupt.

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order vesting B.'s estate in D. and H.—In re Barber's Trusts, CH.D. MOR., J.—58 L. T. 303.

22. Negligence—Investment—Mortgage—Contributory mortgage.—The trustees of a marriage settlement had power to invest the funds "in their or his name or names" on real securities. The trustees, being two in number, joined with the two trustees of a will, one of them being a trustee both of the settlement and the will, in advancing £2,000 on a contributory mortgage, the trustees of the settlement advancing £1,500, those of the will £500. The security was subsequently depreciated in value, and an action was brought by the cestui que trusts under the settlement claiming a declaration that the trustees of it had committed a breach of trust.

Held, that, by advancing money on a contributory mortgage, the trustees had not complete control over the mortgaged property, and were liable to make good the deficiency in value, as such an investment was unauthorised.—Webb v. Jonas, CH.D. REK., J. 666—57 L. J. Ch. 671; 58 L. T. 882.

23. Negligence—Investment—Mortgage—Valuation—Co-trustees—Solicitor.—Trustees advanced money on mortgage of a hotel and stables, and cottages and houses principally let at weekly rents. Valuers were employed, and the particulars furnished by the mortgagors were submitted to them, but the trustees did not make inquiries to verify the statements as to the properties, or letting, or the amount of outgoings. They told the valuers that the mortgagees were trustees, but not that they did not desire to lend more than half the value. They omitted to instruct the valuers to ascertain whether the particulars were correct, or the outgoings or average amount of repairs. The valuers gave their opinion that sums more than one-half of the value might be advanced on the security, and such sums were in each case advanced. The mortgagors became insolvent. The properties were put up for sale, but failed to realise the advances.

Held, that the investments were improper; and that the trustees had been guilty of negligence in not making inquiries as to the particulars, and not giving proper instructions to the valuers, and were jointly and severally liable for the money lost.

One of the trustees, A., was a solicitor, authorised to make professional charges for work done for the trust. The other, B., was the testator's widow and tenant for life of the trust funds. A. took an active part in making the investments, and was paid costs, charging scale fees for negotiating loans, deducing title, and preparing the mortgages, and did not communicate with B. so as to enable her to exercise her judgment upon the investments.

Held, that A. had undertaken to find proper investments, and that B. had joined in advancing the fund on the faith that the investments were proper ones which had been looked into by A. as solicitor; that she had been misled, and he had been guilty of negligence as a solicitor; and that, as between A. and B., A. was liable for the breach of trust.—Partington v. Allen, CH.D. STI., J.—57 L. T. 654.

24. Negligence—Investment—Mortgage—Valuation—Interest.—Trustees, who were authorised to invest upon real securities, proposed to invest the trust funds on the security of a freehold brickfield. Valuers reported that "the land, premises, and freehold fixtures form a good security" for the money to be invested. The trustees, without further inquiry, advanced the money, and the security failed to realise the amount advanced.

Held, that the trustees had not acted with ordinary prudence, and were personally liable to make good the money, with interest at four per cent. from the last payment; and that the tenant for life was not bound to return the excess of interest which had been paid because the security was hazardous.

Decision of the Court of Appeal affirmed.—Learoyd v. Whiteley, H.L. 721—12 App. 727; 57 L. J. Ch. 290; 58 L. T. 93.

25. Negligence — Recovery of trust property — Indemnity.—Trustees are not bound at their own expense to take proceedings for the recovery of trust property not lost by their own default.

A person claiming to be transferee of a mortgage of trust property gave notice of the mortgage to the trustees, who were convinced that the deed was a forgery. The property was afterwards sold under the power of sale in the mortgage at an auction, of which the trustees also had notice, but they took no steps, and accepted the balance of the purchase-money remaining after the claim under the mortgage had been satisfied, and acknowledged the receipt in their accounts.

Held, that the trustees were justified in declining to take any proceedings at their own risk and without an indemnity from their cestui que trusts, and that they had done nothing for which they could be held liable to make good the loss of the property, even if it were proved that it had been lost, which was not proved—Tudball v. Medlicott, CH.D. KEK., J. 886.

26. Remuneration—Solicitor.—Land was devised to A. and a solicitor until B. attained the age of twenty-eight, upon trust to receive the rents and manage the estate. The will empowered any trustee being a solicitor to charge and be paid for all business done as a solicitor, and a legacy of £100 was given to each trustee. The trustees managed the estates for fifteen years, paying themselves a salary of £100 a year each for the trouble of management.

Held, that the payments were unauthorised by the will.—Bedingfield v. Deye, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 332.

27. Tenancy for life—Power of sale—Undivided moiety—Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 2, sub-sections 3, 5, 6; ss. 3, 19.—A devised real estate upon trust for his two sons, James and John, in equal shares, for their respective lives, and after the death of either on trust for the survivor and the issue of the deceased son, such issue to take their parent's share, and after the death of the survivor upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds into two equal shares and pay one such share to the issue of each of his said sons, and if the sons or either of them should die without issue, then to pay one of such shares to such person or persons as the son or sons so dying should by will appoint. There was no gift over in default of appointment. The testator's son John died without having been married and without having exercised the power of appointment, and his undivided share passed to his brother James as heir-at-law of the testator, who sold the undivided share. James then obtained the appointment of two trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and gave them notice of his intention to sell, under the powers given by the Act, the undivided share devised upon trust for him for life.

Held, on a summons by the trustees, that James, being only tenant for life of an undivided share, and not of the whole settled property, had no power to sell his undivided share without the concurrence of the purchaser of the other undivided share.—In re Collings's Settled Estates, CH.D. NOR., J. 264—36 Ch. D. 516; 57 L. J. Ch. 219; 57 L. T. 221.

VENDOR and PURCHASER:—

1. Conditions of sale — Deposit — Forfeiture — Failure of title.—In November, 1882, the plaintiff agreed to purchase land from the defendants, subject to a condition that, if he failed to complete the purchase, the defendants might forfeit the deposit and put the land up for resale. The plaintiff accepted the title, but failed to complete, owing to want of means. In June, 1885, the defendants agreed to sell the land to F., who took an objection to the title, which was brought before the court upon a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874. In January, 1886, an order was made on the summons declaring that the vendors had not shown a good title to the land.

In July, 1886, the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover the deposit paid in November, 1882.

Held, that the plaintiff could not succeed.

2. Conditions of sale—Incumbrances.—A vendor who contracts to sell only such right and interest, if any, as he has, is bound to convey such right and interest free from an existing incumbrance.—Goold v. Birmingham, Dudley, and District Bank, CH.D. KEK., J.—58 L. T. 560.

3. Conditions of sale—Misdescription—"Estimated value"—Compensation.—Property was described in the particulars of sale by auction as "of the estimated annual value of £400." There was a condition entitling the purchaser to compensation if any error or misstatement should have been made in the particulars. The purchaser adduced evidence that the property was only worth £200 a year; but did not allege that the estimate was a dishonest one.

Held, that, as the property was of the "estimated" value stated, and the estimate was not a dishonest one, the purchaser was not entitled to compensation.—In re Hurlbalt and Chaytor, CH.D. NOR., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 421.

4. Covenant—Incumbrances—New street—Paving, &c.—Expenses — Apportionment — Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 7, sub-section 1.—Section 77 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862, does not make the liability to pay paving expenses a charge on land so as to be an incumbrance, claim, or demand within the implied covenant for freedom from incumbrance given by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 7, sub-section 1. The effect of the section is to impose successive personal liabilities on successive owners.—Egg v. Blayney, Q.B.D. 893—21 Q. B. D. 107; 57 L. J. Q. B. 460; 59 L. T. 65.

5. Lease—Covenant — Constructive notice.—Upon an agreement to purchase a lease, the purchaser has constructive notice of the covenants of the lease only when he has a fair opportunity of ascertaining what those covenants are.

6. Lease—Covenant—Damages—Sale of reversion.—A house was advertised for sale by auction, with possession, and with the option of taking the former tenant's fixtures at a valuation. There was no mention of the nature of the tenancy, and the purchase was to be completed on the 25th of March, 1887. A. bought the house at the auction, when the auctioneer stated that it was not in good decorative repair. The abstract of title showed that the house was let on lease, determinable by notice expiring on the 25th of March, with a covenant to give up the premises in good repair. The lessee had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and the vendor had proved for damages for breach of the repairing covenant.

Held, that the purchaser was not entitled to the damages due from the bankrupt's estate.—In re Edis and Brown, CH.D. NOR., J.—58 L. T. 307.

7. Lease—Interest in lease—Underlease.—A vendor agreed to sell all his "interest in the lease" held by him of Verulam Church. It turned out that the vendor only had a title to an under-lease for a term less by three days than the term granted by the original lease.

Held, that the purchaser could not refuse to complete.

Madeley v. Booth, 2 De G. & Sm. 718, distinguished.—Waring v. Scotland, CH.D. NOR., J. 756—59 L. T. 132.

8. Restrictive covenant—Injunction.—In 1856 the owner of an estate had a scheme prepared for laying it out as a building estate, and sold a few plots in 1857. In 1882 other portions were offered for sale, by the trustees of the late owner, in lots, some of which were subject to various restrictive conditions, and the others of which were free from any restriction. The plaintiff C. bought several of the free lots and one of those subject to a condition. In 1883 another sale took place of the lots left unsold in 1882, together with further lots, some free from restriction; and the latter were bought by the plaintiffs. In 1885 the defendant bought certain lots originally left unsold in 1882, and which were subject to the condition of building thereon houses of the value of £1,200 each, and entered into a covenant in the required terms with the vendors. The plan on the conditions showed the houses built on certain of the lots sold in 1857. The defendant intended to build houses of less value than £1,200 each on the lots so purchased by him.

Held (following Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 16 Q. B. D. 778), that, though the plaintiffs could not sue on the covenant entered into by the defendant with the trustees, the inference from the circumstances was that the restrictions as to building houses of a certain value were for the benefit of all the purchasers of lots on the estate, and therefore that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from building houses of less value than £1,200 each.—Collins v. Castle, CH.D. KEK., J. 300—36 Ch. D. 243.

9. Restrictive covenant—Lease—Notice—Misrepresentation—Specific performance.—The vendor of a leasehold property is bound to know all covenants in the lease, and if the intending purchaser states his object in purchasing, the vendor is bound to disclose all covenants which would affect that object, and his silence is equivalent to a representation that no such covenant exists, even if he is not aware of its extent or operation.—Power v. Barrett, V.C. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 450.

10. Restrictive covenant—Separate lots—Adjacent owners.—The owner of building land sold a part of it in lots for the building of houses. All the conveyances bore date, the 5th of December, 1787, or the 5th of February, 1788, and contained a covenant by the purchaser with the vendor, his heirs and assigns, to erect a house according to a plan signed by the vendor and purchaser, and a covenant that the front of the house should never be altered. The houses were built at the same time and were similar in appearance, but no plan was produced.

Held, that the covenant not to alter the front of the house was not enforceable by one purchaser against another.—Sheppard v. Gilmore, CH.D. STI., J.—57 L. J. Ch. 6.

11. Title—Defect—Tenancy for life—Specific performance—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 3, 22, 45, sub-sections 1, 3.—The contract on a sale of the fee by a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, fixed the date for completion on the 29th of September, but the court held, on the conditions of sale, that, in this respect, time was not of the essence of the contract. On examining the abstract, the purchaser took the objection, on the 25th of August, that there were no proper trustees for the purposes of the Act, whereupon the vendor, after some further correspondence, on the 6th of October, took out a summons for the appointment of trustees, and informed the purchaser that he had done so. The purchaser replied, on the 8th, that he repudiated the contract. On the 29th the order appointing trustees was made. They waived the notice of sale which should have been given to them by the tenant for life, and notice of the order and waiver was given to the purchaser. He, on the 3rd of November, commenced an action for return of the deposit.

Held, that the purchaser had nothing to do with the trustees except to pay them his purchase-money; that, before completion, there must be trustees for the purposes of the Act to receive the purchase-money, or to enable the tenant for life to direct payment into court under section 22; that the absence of trustees was a defect of conveyancing only, not a defect of title, and the purchaser had no right to repudiate the contract, and that, even if it had been a defect of title, the purchaser ought to have given notice to remove the defect within a reasonable time, and not put an end to the contract brevi manu.—Hatten v. Russell, CH.D. KAY, J. 317—38 Ch. D. 334; 57 L. J. Ch. 425; 58 L. T. 271.

12. Title—Evidence—Mortgage.—In 1818 freehold property was mortgaged by a conveyance of the fee simple to trustees upon trust, at any time after the expiration of six months from the date named for repayment of the principal, to sell the property discharge the debt, interest, and costs out of the proceeds, and pay the residue to the mortgagor, his executors, administrators, or assigns. The deed contained a proviso for redemption, and for making the receipt of the trustees, their heirs, or assigns, a sufficient discharge to a purchaser, and exonerating a purchaser from seeing to the application of the purchase-money, and rendering unnecessary the concurrence of the mortgagor, or his heirs, in a conveyance under the trust for sale; but it did not contain a provision exonerating a purchaser from inquiring whether default had been made in payment of principal or interest. The mortgagor died in 1839, having by his will devised the property to several of his children in succession, as tenants for life, with remainders over. The surviving tenant for life died in 1887, and A. and B., in whom the mortgage had become vested by transfer, contracted to sell the property. The vendors sold as mortgagees, in pursuance of the trust.

Held, (1) that, without the concurrence of all the persons entitled to the equity of redemption, it was necessary, in order that the vendors should make a good title, by obtaining statutory declarations, to furnish evidence of the subsistence of the mortgage from the death of the mortgagor till the date of the sale.—Hollingworth v. Willing, CH.D. CHI., J.—58 L. T. 789.

WARRANTY:—

1. Horse—Conditions of sale—Return—Disablement of horse.—The plaintiff bought from the defendant a horse warranted quiet to ride, one condition of sale being that, if the buyer contended that the horse did not correspond to the warranty it must be returned on the second day after the sale, and that the non-return within the time named should be a bar to any claim on the ground of breach of warranty. While the plaintiff was removing the horse it fell, and was so injured that it could not be safely returned within the time named, but the plaintiff at once gave notice to the defendant that the horse did not correspond to the warranty.

Held, that the non-return of the horse on the second day after the sale was not a bar to an action for breach of warranty.—Chapman v. Withers, Q.B.D.—20 Q. B. D. 824; 57 L. J. Q. B. 457; 58 L. T. 94.

2. Sale of goods—Sample—Latent defect—Implied warranty.—Caveat emptor.—Cloth merchants ordered from cloth manufacturers worsted coatings, which were to be equal in quality and weight to certain samples previously sent by the manufacturers, who were aware that the goods were to be sold to tailors. The samples and the goods supplied were similar in every respect, but in both a latent defect existed which rendered the coatings unmerchantable for the purpose of making up into coats in the usual manner.

Held, that there was an implied warranty that the goods shall not, by reason of the mode of manufacture, be unfit for use in the manner in which goods of the same quality of material and the same general character and designation ordinarily would be used.

Decision of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

WASTE.—See LANDLORD AND TENANT, 8, 11.

WATER:—

1. Canal—Mining—Subsidence—Percolation—Injunction.—A canal company, under the powers of a special Act, constructed a canal, which subsequently became vested in a railway company, subject to the same rights and duties as the canal company had held it. A mill was built close to the canal, and, by reason of the owner of the mines and minerals under the canal working them, the mill and canal subsided, but the railway company retained the canal at the original level by elevating the banks on both sides. Water percolated through the banks and damaged the mill.

Held, that the company were liable for negligence in not preventing the water from percolating, and that the fact that the mine-owner's working the mines was the ultimate cause of the injury did not affect their liability.

Held, further, that, as the subsidence could not have been prevented, and could not be prevented in the future, no injunction ought to be granted, but the plaintiff must claim compensation under the provisions in the special Act.—Evans v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., CH.D. KEK., J. 328—36 Ch. D. 626; 57 L. J. Ch. 153; 57 L. T. 194.

2. Easement—Lease—Reservation—Implied grant—Unity of possession—Injunction.—Land on which were dams and artificial watercourses, and which was held under leases reserving all mills, dams, water, and watercourses, and all convenient ways to and from the same, was offered for sale by auction in an administration action in four lots, the conditions of sale stating that the sale was subject to all rights and legal easements. No sale by auction took place, but a tender by the plaintiff for lot four was accepted, and the conveyance reserved all matters and things excepted and reserved in the lease, and was subject to all existing rights and easements. Lot three was afterwards conveyed to A. by a similar conveyance, and A. afterwards conveyed it to the defendants. Before and at the date of the plaintiff's conveyance, water flowed by an artificial watercourse from lot three to lot four. The watercourse was obstructed by the defendants. The lessor had never interfered with its enjoyment by the plaintiff.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with the flow of the water.—Pullan v. Roughfort Bleaching and Dyeing Co., V.C. (IR.)—21 L. R. IR. 73.

3. Fishery—River—Bed—Conveyance of riparian land—Presumption of property ad medium filum.—The presumption that by a conveyance describing the land conveyed as bounded by a river it is intended to pass the bed of the river ad medium filum may be rebutted by proof of surrounding circumstances negativing the possibility of such intention.

The owners of a manor by conveyance made in 1767 and 1846 granted pieces of land abutting on a river the bed of which formed part of the manor. Before the earlier conveyance a fishery in the river opposite the land conveyed had been during a long period from time to time let by the owners of the manor apart from the riparian land, and in 1846 there was a subsisting lease of the fishery. The purchasers of the riparian land for nearly forty years claimed no right of fishing in the river, but the owners of the manor and their tenants fished without interruption.

Held, that the conveyance of the riparian land passed no rights in any part of the bed of the river.—Duke of Devonshire v. Pattinson, C.A.—20 Q. B. D. 263; 57 L. J. Q. B. 189; 58 L. T. 392.

4. Water rate—Annual value—Annual rack rent—Gross estimated rental—Occupation of owner—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 68—Local Act.—The Barnet Gas and Water Act, 1872, with which is incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, provides (inter alia), that "the company . . . shall furnish . . . a sufficient supply of water . . . at any rate, on the annual rack rental of the house or part of a house or premises supplied if the same be let at rack rent, and on the annual value if and while the same is not let at rack rent, not exceeding" [so much].

Held, that "the annual rack rent" means the same as "the annual value," and does not mean "net annual value."—Stevens v. Barnet District Gas and Water Co., Q.B.D. 924—57 L. J. M. C. 82.

4a. Water rate — Excess — Voluntary payment — Recovery.—The defendants, as sanitary authority for the borough of B., had demanded from the plaintiff, and the plaintiff had paid, a water rent of £8 15s. 4d., such rate being calculated on the "gross rental" of the plaintiff's premises. The plaintiff, contending that such rate ought to have been assessed on the "rateable value" only, brought an action in the county court to recover the difference so overpaid. The defendants had no power to distrain for the rate, but they had a power to stop the water supply for non-payment; they had not stopped the water supply, and had not threatened to do so. The county court judge held that the payment was not a voluntary one, and could be recovered back, on the ground that the defendants had a power to stop the water supply.

Held, that the payment was a voluntary one, and could not be recovered back.—Slater v. Mayor, &c., of Burnley, Q.B.D. 831.

5. Water rate—Supply by meter—Domestic purposes—Dwelling-house—New River Co.'s Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. clx.), ss. 35, 38—41.—By the New River Co.'s Act, 1852, s. 35, the company, if requested, must supply houses within their limits with sufficient water for domestic purposes at certain rates, varying ("for water supplied to any dwelling-house") with the annual value of the dwelling-house. By section 38 domestic purposes are not to include "working any machine or apparatus." By section 41 "The company shall, at the request of any consumer of water, for purposes other than the purposes for or in respect of which the rates or charges are hereinbefore provided or limited, or at their own instance, afford a supply of water by means of a meter, . . . and may charge for such supply at certain limited rates per thousand gallons, according to the total quarterly consumption."

The plaintiffs demanded that a warehouse belonging to them, which was occupied only as a place of business and for storing goods, and not for the purpose of living in, should be supplied with water by the defendants by meter for general purposes and for working a hydraulic lift.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to be so supplied for both purposes at the limited rates fixed by section 41.

Judgment of Kekewich, J. (reported 36 W. R. 122, 36 Ch. D. 641), reversed.—Cooke v. New River Co., C.A.—38 Ch. D. 56; 57 L. J. Ch. 353; 58 L. T. 830.

6. Water rate—Unoccupied house—Liability of owner—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, s. 72.—The owner of a house not exceeding the annual value of £10, who is liable for the payment of water rates instead of the occupier, is not liable for the said rates while the house remains unoccupied, although water is supplied to the pipes on the premises.—British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Co. v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co., Q.B.D. 594.

WAY:—

1. Implied grant—Appurtenances.—In the case of a formed road made over an alleged servient tenement to and for the apparent use of a dominant tenement, there is an implied reservation of the right of way on a demise of the soil of the road, although the easement be neither continuous nor of necessity.

In such a case a subsequent demise of the dominant tenement, "together with the appurtenances belonging thereto," will pass the right of way.—Thomas v. Owen, C.A. 440—20 Q. B. D. 125; 57 L. J. Q. B. 198; 58 L. T. 16.

2. Implied grant—Necessity—Unity of possession.—Where, during unity of possession, a particular and defined way is formed and used over property which is afterwards severed and granted by the owner to different persons, the right of using the way as it is then used may pass by implication, although it be not a way of necessity, and although the general words of the conveyance are not sufficient to pass such right.

An owner of land erected three houses thereon facing road, with gardens at the back. Behind these ran a way which gave access from the gardens of two of the houses to a side road, which ran at right angles to the front road on the other side of the third house. The owner assigned to the defendant the plots of land with the two houses thereon, "with their rights, easements, and appurtenances," and afterwards assigned to the plaintiff the third plot, the dimensions of which comprised so much of the way as lay between the two other plots and the side road. The gardens of the defendant's houses could also be reached from the road in front by two passages, but these were unsuitable for carrying away rubbish from the gardens. The plaintiff disputed the defendant's right to use the way over his land to the side road.

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to this as a way of necessity, but that the right of using the way passed to him by implied grant from the owner, although the general words in the assignment to him were not sufficient to pass such right.—Brown v. Alabaster, CH.D. KAY, J. 155—37 Ch. D. 490; 57 L. J. Ch. 225; 58 L. T. 266.

WILL:—

CONSTRUCTION—

1. Ademption—Parol evidence.—Parol evidence and contemporaneous or subsequent declarations by the testator are admissible to confirm or rebut the legal presumption of ademption of a legacy to the parish priest for the erection of a new chapel in the town of C. is adeemed by a gift in the testator's lifetime to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of the Diocese for the same purpose.—Griffith v. Bourke, M.R. (Ir.)—21 L. R. (Ir.) 92.

2. Ademption—Satisfaction.—A., being indebted to his wife in the sum of £625, bequeathed to her a legacy of that amount, but without any reference to the debt. He afterwards repaid the debt in his lifetime.

Held, that the legacy must be taken to have been given in satisfaction of the debt, and that the payment of the debt was an ademption of the legacy.—Gillings v. Fletcher, CH.D. NOR., J. 841—58 Ch. D. 373.

3. Ademption — Share in business. — A., by his will, bequeathed the residue of his estate equally between his two sons and three daughters, and directed his business premises, goodwill, stock-in-trade, and effects to be sold and to fall into the residue. He afterwards determined to retire from his business in favour of his two sons, and by deed assigned his business to the elder son, with a provision enabling the younger to become partner on attaining full age, and reserving to himself an annuity payable out of the profits of the business.

Held, that the shares of the two sons in the residue were adeemed to the extent of the value, at the date of the assignment, of the gift to them of the business, and that such value must be taken into consideration in estimating the daughter's shares.— Vickers v. Vickers, CH.D. NOR., J. 545—37 Ch. D. 525; 57 L. J. Ch. 738; 58 L. T. 920.

4. Advancement—Composition deed—Principal and surety.—The testator's son agreed to purchase a business for £300 and a further sum payable by instalments. The testator advanced the £300, and joined with his son in promissory notes to secure the instalments, the first of which he paid when it fell due. The rest were paid by his executors out of his estate. The testator by his will gave his son a share in his residuary estate, directing that advances should be repaid or taken as part of the share. After the testator's death the son executed a creditor's deed, under which the vendor of the business proved for his unpaid purchase-money, but did not obtain satisfaction. The deed contained a release to the principal debtor and a reservation of rights against sureties.

Held, that the sums paid by the testator were advances within the meaning of the will, but that the sums paid by the executors were not; that such advances were not to be deemed advancements for the benefit of the son; and that, as to the subsequent instalments which the executors had paid, they might retain them out of the income of the son's share, or might prove under the creditor's deed, in which case they must adopt the proof already made by the vendor, and stand in his shoes.—Whitehouse v. Edwards, CH.D. STI., J. 181—37 Ch. D. 683; 57 L. J. Ch. 161; 57 L. T. 761.

5. After-acquired property — Married woman—Power of appointment—Codicil.—A married woman who had a power of appointment over certain property under her marriage settlement, by her will, dated in 1883, in exercise of the power, and "all other powers enabling her in this behalf," appointed, gave, and bequeathed all the property comprised in the settlement, and over which she had any power of appointment, to certain persons. She subsequently, on the death of her husband, became entitled to certain real estate and personal estate, and made a codicil to her will, devising certain real estate, described as having come from her late husband, but without confirming her will.

Held, that the will was confined to the settlement property, and there was an intestacy as to the subsequently-acquired personal estate.—Whitby v. Higton, CH.D. CHI., J. 683—57 L. J. Ch. 430; 58 L. T. 842.

6. After-acquired property—Specific devise—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 24.—A., by a codicil dated in 1867, devised to the defendant in fee "all those three freehold cottages and premises thereto belonging, situated in E., adjoining the C. Inn, which I have lately purchased." A. afterwards sold two of the cottages, but he lived in the third till 1883, when he died. In 1875 he bought a garden behind the cottage where he lived, and used it for the rest of his life as a part of his residence.

Held, that the garden did not pass with the cottage which remained unsold. — Cave v. Harris, CH.D. KEK., J. 182—57 L. J. Ch. 62; 57 L. T. 768.

7. Annuity—Clear annuity—Legacy duty.—A., by his will, directed his trustees, out of the proceeds of his real and personal estate, to pay to S., until she should marry, "a clear yearly annuity of £250," and in the event of her marriage to pay to her "a clear yearly annuity of £100" during the remainder of her life, and he further directed them, after payment of the said annuity of £250 or £100, as the case might be, to pay to E. "a clear yearly sum of £31 4s., free of legacy duty."

Held, that S. was entitled to an annuity free of legacy duty.—Nelson v. Robins, CH.D. NOR., J.—58 L. T. 382.

8. Annuity—Condition—Illegality—Public policy.—A. gave all his property to a trustee upon trust, after payment of debts, &c., to pay to M., "during such time as she may live apart from her husband, before my son attains the age of twenty-one years, the sum of £2 10s. per week for her maintenance whilst so living apart from her husband," and the will contained a gift of residue. M. and her husband were living together, and the property consisted of personalty.

Held, that the provision as to living apart was void, as contra bonos mores; that it was a limitation, and not a condition; and that the annuity was void also.—Trafford v. Maconochie, CH.D. KAY, J. 427—57 L. J. Ch. 320; 58 L. T. 70.

9. Annuity—Deficiency—Leaseholds—Charge on corpus.—A. bequeathed leasehold property on trust, out of the rents and profits, to pay his just debts, and subject thereto to pay thereout to his wife for her life an annuity of £150, and, subject to the above trusts, he bequeathed the said land on trust to receive the rents and profits and apply them for the maintenance and education of his eldest son, and to assign to him, on his attaining the age of twenty-one, the said lands and any accumulations of rents and profits.

Held, that the annuity was a charge on the corpus of the leaseholds.—In re Moore, L.J. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 385.

10. Annuity—Lapse—Tenancy for life.—A. bequeathed £1,000 Consols, over which he had a power of appointment subject to the life interest therein of his wife, to trustees on trust, after the decease of his wife, to invest the same in the purchase of an annuity for the life of his nephew, J.; but in case his nephew should in anywise incumber the said annuity, or be outlawed, or take the benefit of any Act of Parliament made or to be made for the relief of insolvent debtors, then he should not be entitled to receive the said annuity, but it should fall into the residue, which the testator gave to his wife. The testator died in 1837. J. died in 1853, having been insolvent in 1833, but having, subsequently to that date, done no act to forfeit the annuity. The testator's wife died in 1854, having treated the annuity as lapsed, and bequeathed it to various legatees. No annuity was ever purchased for J.

Held, that the fund out of which the annuity was to be purchased had lapsed by the death of J. before the death of the testator's widow.

Semble, a forfeiture clause in a will does not take effect if the forfeiture be committed before the date of the will.—In re Draper's Trusts, CH.D. KEK., J. 783—58 L. T. 942.

11. "Children"—"Representatives"—Illegitimate children.—A., by his will, dated in 1868, after giving his residuary real and personal estate to trustees on trust for sale, conversion, and investment, directed his trustees to stand possessed of a certain share in the trust fund upon trust to pay the income thereof "to my sister C., the wife of H.," during her life, and, after her death, to pay and divide the share unto and between all "her children" who should be living at her decease, and the "representatives" of such of them as should have died in her lifetime leaving issue living at her decease, who should have attained the age of twenty-one years, "equally, share and share alike, but so, nevertheless, that the representative or representatives of such of them so dying shall take only the share to which the deceased child would have been entitled had he or she survived" C. C. was not the wife of H. at the date of the will or at any other time. H. was, previously to 1845, married to another woman, who was, at the date of the will, living and his lawful wife. In 1845 C. went to live with H., with whom she cohabited from that time down to her death in 1886. Of this union several children were born. The testator knew all the circumstances of the case, visited his sister, was on intimate terms with H., and recognised the children as his nephews and nieces.

Held, that the illegitimate children of C. and H. were intended and were entitled to take under the will.

Hill v. Crook, 22 W. R. 137, 6 E. & I. 265, discussed and followed.

Held, also, that the word "representatives" must be construed as next of kin or as descendants, and not as "executors or administrators."—Eagleton v. Horner, CH.D. STI., J. 348—37 Ch. D. 695; 57 L. J Ch. 211; 58 L. T. 103.

12. Class gift—Half blood — Presumption.—The presumption is that a gift in a will to relations includes relations of the half blood, but such presumption may be overruled by the context.—In re Reed, CH.D. CHI., J. 682—57 L. J. Ch. 790.

13. Class gift—Period of distribution.—Although, as to a testamentary gift of corpus, it is an established rule of construction that, where there is a gift to children as a class made payable on attaining a given age or marriage, the class closes when the first child becomes entitled to a share, and after-born children are excluded, such rule will not be applied by the court in the construction of the will to a testamentary gift of income.—Wenmoth v. Wenmoth, CH.D. CHI., J. 409—37 Ch. D. 266; 57 L. T. 709.

14. Condition.—A. executed the following will in Ireland:—"As I am about to leave home for Bangor, should any accident take me out of this world I will to M. £500, and also furniture to the amount of £50 at her selection, . . . for her sole and separate use. . . . The remainder of all I am possessed of I leave to my daughter S. for her sole and separate use, . . . and should, in God's inscrutable providence, anything take her and her son away from this world before I again make my will, . . . I will everything I may be possessed of to M. for her sole and separate use." The testator went to Bangor and returned safely a week afterwards, and died six years afterwards without making another will.

Held, that the will was not contingent on an accident occurring to him during his journey to Bangor.—In the Goods of Stuart, P. & D.D. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 105.

15. Condition—Charge on real estate.—A., by his will, appointed executors, and continued: "I give to my two sons . . . all my real and personal property . . . for their life, subject to the condition of paying" legacies. "If my sons marry and have issue, I give to each of their heirs their father's share, and to their heirs for ever; if there is no male issue with either of my two sons, and there is female issue, then the father's share shall be divided between them share and share alike as tenants in common, and to their heirs for ever. Should either of my sons die without issue, then such son's share shall go to my other son and to his heirs for ever. Should both of my sons die without issue, then at the death of the last of them I give all of my real property to the whole of my grandchildren share and share alike as tenants in common, and to their heirs for ever." He directed his two sons to pay out of his real property any payment due and owing thereon.

Held, that the sons took the real estate in tail male and the personalty absolutely, subject to the conditions in the will.—Tolman v. Score, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 40.

16. Condition — Clerks and workmen — "Full salary"—Legacy duty.—The will of M. contained the following bequest: "My office and warehouse employés such as clerks and workmen, shall have to receive six months' full salary."

Held, that only persons who were in the testator's employment were entitled to the benefit, and that they were not entitled to six months' salary free from legacy duty.—Marcus v. Marcus, CH.D. NOR., J.—56 L. J. Ch. 830; 57 L. T. 407.

17. Conversion — Discretion — Absolute trust.—A. devised real estate upon trust at any time as to the trustees should seem most expedient to sell the same and hold the proceeds in trust for his sons D., E., G., and M., if and when they should attain the age of twenty-one, in equal shares. D. predeceased the testator, and his share devolved on E. as the testator's heir-at-law. G. attained the age of twenty-one and died unmarried and intestate, leaving his mother and E. and M. his next of kin. M. attained the age of twenty-one, and died, having by his will given all his real personal estate to E., who died after having been found a lunatic by inquisition. At the time of E.'s death the real estate was unsold, and letters of administration of E.'s personal estate was granted to the Solicitor to the Treasury.

Held, (1) that the trust for conversion was absolute, notwithstanding the discretion to postpone it; (2) that the real estate must be treated as personal estate; (3) that the Solicitor to the Treasury was entitled as administrator to E.'s beneficial interest in the real estate.—Gilbert v. Aviolet, CH.D. CHI., J.—58 L. T. 43.

18. Cy-près—Lifeboat Institution—A. bequeathed £10,000 to his executors on trust to pay such sum to the trustees of the National Lifeboat Institution on condition of their constructing and maintaining two tubular lifeboats at D. and P. respectively, and the trustees accepted the trust. The coast at D. was sufficiently supplied with tubular lifeboats.

Held, that the trustees should be permitted to place a tubular lifeboat at N. instead of at D.—In re Richardson, CH.D. CHI., J.—58 L. T. 45.

19. "Die leaving no family."—A. devised real estate to his son B., and directed:—"Should my son B. and his wife E. die leaving no family, his share is to revert to my daughters D. and H. B. had several children, who all predeceased him, and left no issue. B., by his will, devised and bequeathed to E. all the real and personal estate to which he should be entitled at his death.

Held, that E. took only a life interest in the estate devised by A. to B., and that D. and H. took a reversion in fee.—Armstrong v. Armstrong, C.A. (Ir.) —21 L. R. Ir. 115.

20. "Die without issue."—T. gave all his property to his daughter with a gift over if she should "die before the age of twenty-one, and at any time without issue." The daughter attained twenty-one, married, and had a child.

Held, that "die without issue" mean without leaving issue alive at the time of her death.—Clay v. Coles, CH.D. STI., J.—57 L. T. 682.

21. "Die without leaving issue male."— A. bequeathed his residuary personal estate upon trust for W. and his issue male, and in default of such issue for R. and his issue male, "and in case the said R. shall die without leaving issue male," then over to J. R. died in the lifetime of W. having had one child, a son, who predeceased him. W. afterwards died without issue.

Held, that the words "die without leaving issue male" must be construed as "die without leaving issue male living at his death," and not as "die without having had issue male"; and that the gift over to J. took effect.

White v. Hight, 12 Ch. D. 751, 27 W. R. Dig. 245, not followed.—Slattery v. Ball, CH.D. NOR., J. 265—36 Ch. D. 508; 57 L. J. Ch. 493.

22. Executor according to the tenor—Trustees—Distribution.—A. appointed the trustees of his will executors thereof, and on the death of one of them he substituted B. as trustee, and made certain alterations in the division of his property, whereby his trustees were required to get in all his estate and invest and distribute it, after the payment of funeral and other expenses.

Held, that B. was entitled, jointly with the other executors, to probate as executor according to the tenor.—In the Goods of Lush, P.D. & A.D. 847—13 P. D. 20; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 23; 58 L. T. 684.

23. Executor according to the tenor—Trustees—Payment of debts.—A direction to pay debts is not a necessary condition to the appointment of an executor according to the tenor. A. bequeathed all his property "to my two children, subject to the following limitations: I wish to appoint B., C., and D. my trustees for the objects of this my will, everything I have to be vested in them."

Held, B., C., and D. were executors according to the tenor.—In the Goods of MacKane, C.A. (Ir.)—11 L. R. Ir. 1.

24. Forfeiture—Bankruptcy—Annulment.—A. gave his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust, to pay one-third of the proceeds to his son until he should die or become bankrupt, or assign, charge, or incumber, or attempt to assign, charge, or incumber the same or any part, or do something whereby the same or some part would by operation of law or otherwise, if belonging absolutely to him, become vested in, or payable to, some other person, with a gift over on the failure or determination of the trust. Before the death of the testator insolvency proceedings were instituted against his son in Melbourne, and trustees of his estate were appointed, who gave notice to the trustees of the testator's will to pay over to them any sums in their hands to which the bankrupt was entitled. The insolvency proceedings were afterwards annulled, and the insolvency trustees had received nothing from the trustees of the will.

Held, that, notwithstanding the annulment of the insolvency, the forfeiture had taken effect.—Post v. Broughton, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 8.

25. Forfeiture—Felony—Forfeitures Abolition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 23), ss. 8, 30.—A., by her will, dated in 1869, devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate to K. in trust for C. for life, and after her decease upon trust to pay to or permit D. to receive the interest for life, but if he should become bankrupt or insolvent, or compound with his creditors, or should assign or incumber his interest, or any part thereof, or otherwise by his own act, or by operation of law, be deprived of the absolute personal enjoyment of such interest, or any part thereof, the trust in favour of D. should be void, and K. should thenceforth apply the interest for the maintenance, education, and support of the children of D. The testatrix died in 1871, and C. died in 1881. In 1878 D. was convicted of felony, and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude. Before the expiration of his sentence he obtained a ticket-of-leave, and commenced an action for the administration of the estate of the testatrix, and arrears of interest.

Held, that, under section 30 of the Forfeitures Abolition Act, 1870, D. could maintain the action; that he had not been deprived of the actual enjoyment of the life interest by any operation of law; and that he was entitled to arrears of interest.—Darley v. King, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 219.

26. Forfeiture—Non-residence—Tenancy for life—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 51.—The testator gave to his wife an annuity of £200, and also devised his mansion-house and five cottages upon trust to permit her to occupy the mansion-house and receive the rents of the cottages until (among other things) she should fail to comply with certain directions, one of which was that she should reside in the mansion-house, and not absent herself for more than three calendar months in any year, otherwise the annuity of £200 and her interest in the mansion-house and cottages were to cease. The widow remained away from the mansion-house, nursing an invalid daughter, for more than three calendar months, but did not, as tenant for life of the property, let or sell the mansion-house before the expiration of that period.

Held, that the condition of forfeiture on non-residence was valid, except so far as it would prevent the widow, as tenant for life, from leasing or selling the property, and that, as she had broken the condition, the forfeiture took effect.—Kemp v. Haynes, CH.D. NOR., J. 321—37 Ch. D. 306; 57 L. J. Ch. 519; 58 L. T. 14.

27. Forfeiture—Perpetuity—Charitable gift.—A. bequeathed a sum of money to trustees upon trust to invest and pay the income to the incumbent of a certain church and his successors so long as they allowed the sittings in the church to be occupied free from pew rents; but in case any incumbent should receive payment in respect of sittings in the church, then the testatrix directed that the money and income should fall into the residue of her estate.

Held, that the condition of forfeiture of the legacy was not void on the ground of perpetuity, and that the legacy would cease if any future incumbent should receive payment for sittings in the chuch; also that it was not a gift for the general purpose of charity with respect to which a scheme could be made.—Randell v. Dixon, CH.D. NOR., J. 548.

28. Gift over—Forfeiture—Repugnancy.—D. devised and appointed real and personal estate upon trust for B., his heir and assigns, and directed that, in the event of his doing or suffering anything whereby he should be deprived of the beneficial enjoyment thereof, then the trust for his benefit should determine, and the property should go and be held in trust for his wife.

Held, that the events upon which the executory devise was to take effect were (1) alienation, (2) bankruptcy or judment and execution; that the first was unlimited, and therefore void; that the second was an attempt to avoid the operation of the bankruptcy laws, and was also void; and that B. was absolutely entitled.—Dugdale v. Dugdale, CH.D. KAY, J. 462—38 Ch. D. 176; 57 L. J. Ch. 634; 58 L. T. 581.

29. Gift over—Marriage of legatee—Death of legatee.—A. bequeathed to his daughter £120 a year, so long as she should remain single, and directed that on the day of her marriage the principal should be divided among his children.

Held, that the gift over took effect on the daughter's death.—Scarborough v. Scarborough, CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. T. 851.

30. "Household effects"—Wine.—A., by his will, devised his freehold house with the appurtenances to his wife for life, and bequeathed all his "furniture, pictures, plate, jewellery, horses and carriages, and other household effects," to his wife absolutely.

Held, that the wine in the house passed under the words, "other household effects."—Bourne v. Brandreth, CH.D. KAY, J.—58 L. T. 537.

31. "Household servants."—The testator gave to each of his "household servants" who should have been in his service for one year previously to his death six months' wages, free of legacy duty, in addition to the wages which might be then due to him or her respectively.

Held, that "household servants" included only servants who boarded in the house and took their meals there.—Savile v. Yeatman, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 475.

32. Lapse—"Die without leaving issue legally to inherit."—A. bequeathed a share in his property to B. who was not one of his children or issue, the will containing a direction that, if any legatee should die before the will took effect, "without leaving any children legally to inherit," his or her share should "lapse to the general fund." B. pre-deceased the testator, but left children who survived the latter.

Held, that B.'s children were entitled to his share.—McOlean v. Simpson, V.C. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 528.

33. Leasehold—Purchase of reversion—Locke King's Act Amendment Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 34), s. 1.—Locke King's Act Amendment Act, 1877, applies to leaseholds.

A., by his will, made in 1884, bequeathed to his wife the leasehold house "in which I now reside." At the date of his will he was residing in a leasehold house. In 1887 he entered into a contract with his lessor to purchase the ground lease, but died before completion of the purchase. His widow accepted the bequest.

Held, that the testator's interest in the house passed to the wife subject to her liability to pay the purchase-money.—Drake v. Kershaw, CH.D. NOR., J. 413—57 L. J. Ch. 599; 37 Ch. D. 674; 58 L. T. 512.

34. Legacy—Satisfaction—Husband and wife—Separation deed—Covenant.—By a separation deed a husband covenanted that his heirs, executors, or administrators should, out of his estate and immediately after his death, pay £100 to his wife if she should survive him. Such payment might be made by paying instalments of £6 a month for six months, and the balance immediately afterwards. On the same day the husband made his will, and, after payment of debts, bequeathed to his wife £100, payable within six months after his death, £6 a month to be paid to her order till his estate was finally settled, such amount to be deducted from the £100 in the manner provided in the separation deed.

Held, that the wife was entitled to £100 under the deed as well as £100 under the will.—Horlock v. Wiggins, CH.D. KEK., J.—58 L. T. 725.

35. Life estate—"All my interest."—A., by his will, bequeathed "all my interest of my houses and cottages," the estate being copyhold, to S., subject to life interests.

Held, that the words "all my interest" were not in the nature of a recital, and that G. took an estate in fee.—In re De la Hunt and Pennington, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 874.

36. Life estate—Cash at bank—Investment.—The testator directed his debts to be paid, and, subject thereto, gave his personal estate to his widow for her own use as long as she might live, and on her death directed the remainder of his personal estate to be made into money, and bequeathed the same to his brothers and sisters, and appointed his widow executrix. The estate included cash at the bank.

Held, that the widow had no absolute power of disposal over the personal estate, but took only a life estate, with a right to enjoy the property in specie, and that the cash at the bank must be invested.—Holden v. Smith, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. J. Ch. 648.

37. "Other sons or son."—Real estate was limited by will to the use of the testator's second son for life, remainder to the use of his sons successively in tail male, remainder in similar terms to the use of the testator's third son for life and his sons in tail male, remainder to the use of the testator's fourth, fifth, and all and every other his son and sons. The testator left three sons, of whom the second and third had died without issue.

Held, that the eldest son was not entitled to take under the words "other son," and that the rule that porcreatis and porcreandis are to be construed in the same way will yield to the expression of a contrary intention on the part of the testator.—Locke v. Dunlop, CH.D. STI., J. 41—56 L. J. Ch. 697; 57 L. T. 157.

38. Partnership—"Share, right, and interest"——Debt due from partnership.—A., who carried on a partnership business, bequeathed to his wife all his personal estate not being partnership assets, property, and effects, and bequeathed to his son all his "share, right, and interest" in the partnership business, in trust for his wife for life, with remainder to his son and two daughters. There was due to the testator from the partnership a debt of considerable amount, on which interest was paid, in accordance with the articles of partnership and subsequent agreement between the partners.

Held, that the debt was not included in the disposition of the testator's share, right, and interest in the partnership business, but passed to the widow as part of the personal estate.—Simpson v. Beard, CH.D. NOR., J. 519—58 L. T. 629.

39. Perpetuity.—A bequest of £1,000 to S., the superioress of the Convent of Mercy at K., "to and for the purposes solely of the said convent, or to such other person as may be superioress of the said convent at my decease," is not void for perpetuity.—In re Wilkinson's Trusts, C.A. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 531.

40. Perpuity—Charity—Religious communities.—A. bequeathed certain railway shares to M., superioress of the S. Convent, in trust for the community of the said convent, and certain bank stock to R., provincial of the Franciscan Missionaries, or the provincial of such missionaries at the date of the testatrix's death, for masses, and also other bank stock to the sisters of the G. Convent, and the residue of her real and personal estate to B., superioress of the said S. Convent, in trust for the maintenance of the said convent.

Held, the that legacies were not invalid on the ground of perpetuity, but were valid bequests to the respective legatees as individuals.—Bradshaw v. Jackman, M.R. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 12.

41. Perpetuity—Religious uses.—A., by her will, directed her trustees to sell her interest in certain real estates, and out of the proceeds to apply £100 towards masses offered up in public for her soul and the souls of B. and D. B. was then dead, but D. survived the testatrix.

Held, that the legacy was not void on the ground of perpetuity.—Reichenbach v. Quin, V.C. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 138.

42. Power of appointment—"Clear value"—Residue.—The testatrix, in exercise of a general power of appointment under her marriage settlement, appointed that the trustees of the settlement should stand possessed of so much of the trust funds as should be "of the clear value of £1,000," in trust to pay the same to the trustees of her will, upon trust to pay the same to C. After several other appointments in similar language, the will contained an appointment of "all the residue of the said trust funds." There was no direction for payment of debts, duty, or expenses, and no other property was disposed of.

Held, that the interposition of other trustees did not affect the question; that the word "clear" showed that the rule by which an appointment of the residue of a fund is held to be a gift of a definite sum, not of residue in the ordinary sense, did not apply; and that all the outgoings on the prior appointments must be discharged out of the part of the fund appointed as residue.—Bjorkman v. Earl of Kimberley, CH.D. KAY, J. 752—57 L. J. Ch. 743; 59 L. T. 200.

43. Power of appointment—Default—Intestacy.—A. left all his property, subject to legacies, to A., B., and C. for their joint and several lives, and also directed as follows: "In leaving my property to my three nieces, as co-heirs, it is my wish that, if my grandnephew W. conducts himself to their satisfaction they shall leave him the property I now leave to them." W. predeceased A. and B., who both died intestate.

Held, (1) that the power of appointment could be exercised only by will; (2) that there was an intestacy as to the real estate.—Moore v. Ffolliot, M.R. (Ir.)—19 L. R. 499.

44. Power of appointment—Revocation—Codicil.—A. bequeathed a share of his residuary personal estate upon trust for his sister for life, and, after the decease of the survivor of herself and the tenants for life of the other shares of residue, upon trust for such of the children of two of his brothers as she should by will appoint, and, in default, upon trust for all such children living at the death of the survivor of the tenants for life, and the children of such of them as should be then dead. By a codicil the testator revoked all bequests whatsoever in favour of his sister.

Held, that the effect of the codicil was to revoke the power of appointment, and that the gift in default of appointment took effect.—Currey v. Brough, CH.D KAY, J. 409—38 Ch. D. 456; 58 L. T. 788; 57 L. J. Ch. 436.

45. Property at bank—Share certificates.—A., who had a cash balance and also share certificates, some of which were inscribed in his name and others payable to bearer at R.'s bank, made a bequest of "half my property at R.'s bank."

Held, that half of the cash balance and half of the shares passed under the bequest.

Decision of Chitty, J. (reported 36 W. R. 179, 36 Ch. D. 473), reversed.—Desinge v. Beare, C.A. 561—37 Ch. D. 481; 57 L. J. Ch. 342; 58 L. T. 784.

46. Real estate—Leaseholds—Wills Act, 1837, s. 26.—A., by his will, gave all his real estate in Kent on trust for his sons in strict settlement. He gave all his real estate in Durham and Middlesex and elsewhere, and leasehold estate at S. in Durham, and all the residue of his personal estate, upon trust, as to his personal estate, for sale and conversion, and, as to his real and personal estates in Middlesex and Durham, upon the same trusts already declared; and subject, as to the leaseholds, to the rents and covenants in the existing or any future lease.

Held, that the gift of real estate in Durham and Middlesex passed all the leaseholds.—Greenwell v. Davison, CH.D. NOR., J.—58 L. T. 304.

46. Revocation — Codicil. — A., by her will, bequeathed a watch to B. and a brooch to D., and also a legacy of £200 to B. Three years later she executed a codicil, which recited the legacies of the watch and brooch, and proceeds as follows:—"I hereby revoke and make void the said legacies and bequests in my will contained in favour of the said B. and D., and declare that my said will shall be read as if the names of the said B. and D. had not been inserted therein, and in all other respects I confirm my said will."

Held, that the legacy of £200 was not revoked by the codicil.

Decision of Kay, J., reversed.—Boote v. Dutton, C.A.—59 L. T. 21.

47. Substitution—Class gift.—A., by his will, gave the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees, on trust to sell and to invest the surplus after payment of debts, and to divide the income between all his brothers and sisters, share and share alike, during their respective lives. After the respective deaths of the brothers and sisters, the principal of the residuary property to which each should be entitled was to go to his or her child or children in equal shares. A. had two brothers and one sister, all of whom had married and had children and predeceased to the testator. The sister and one brother died before the date of the will.

Held, that the residue was divisible equally between the families of the brothers and sister per stirpes.—Walsh v. Blayney, V.C. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 148.

48. "Survivor"—Cross-remainders—Estates tail.—A., who died in 1831, by her will, executed in 1827, devised her real estate after the death of her daughter, as to one-fourth part thereof to the use of T., a son of the daughter, with remainder to the use of his children as tenants in common in tail; and if there should be a failure of issue of any such child or children, then, as to the share of such child or children whose issue should so fail, to the use of the remaining or other of the said children as tenants in common in tail; and in case there should be a failure of all such children but one, or if there should be but one such child, to the use of such remaining or only child in tail; and in default of such issue, to the use of the right heirs of the testatrix. The testatrix devised the other three-fourths of her real estate upon similar limitations in favour of three other children of the daughter and their issue. By a codicil she directed that, in case any or either of her grandchildren named in her will should die without leaving any child or children, then the share or shares of them, him, or her so dying in the hereditaments devised by her will should go to and devolve on the "survivor or survivors" of her grandchildren and the heirs of his, her, or their respective bodies. Two of the grandchildren died leaving children. Another died without having married. T. was the survivor, and he died without having had a child.

Held, that T.'s share, on his death without having had a child, devolved upon the two grandchildren who left children, equally between them, as tenants in common in tail.—Ashow v. Ashow, CH.D. NOR., J. 630—57 L. J. Ch. 629; 58 L. T. 472.

49. Tenancy for life—Conditional gift—"Heirs and assigns."—A condition in a gift to a tenant for life that the premises are to be kept in repair and insured does not indicate an intention to give the trustees the legal estate for the purpose of enabling them to enforce the condition, if they would not take it otherwise, as the condition can be enforced against the tenant for life by the remainderman without the intervention of the trustees.

The rule that trustees take only as much of the legal estate as is sufficient to enable them to perform the duties imposed on them does not apply where the gifts of the life interest and the remainder are made without any change of words, as where there is a devise to trustees, their heirs and assigns, "in trust for A. for life," and after his death, "in trust for his children.

A. gave and devised a freehold property and flour-mill, together with the millstones, &c., grates, and other fixtures "now thereon or therein," to trustees, their heirs and assigns, upon trust for A. for life, but subject to a condition to keep the premises, fixtures, &c., in repair, and insure the buildings in the names of the trustees; and from and after A.'s decease in trust for his children. Mortgage and trust estates were devised "unto and to the use of" the trustees, their heirs and assigns. There was a declaration that the receipt of the trustees should be a sufficient discharge, and a power to appoint new trustees, with a direction that the estate should, upon any such appointment, be "vested" in the new and continuing trustees "upon and for the trusts and purposes aforesaid."

Held, that the trustees took no estate in the freehold property so given and devised.—Tudball v. Medliott, CH.D. KEK., J. 886.

50. Tenancy for life—Gift over—"Then"—Intestacy.—A. bequeathed his residuary personal estate upon trust for B. for life, and from and after B.'s death for all the children of M., "and the lawful issue of such of them as may be then dead." B. and all M.'s children predeceased the testator, but one of the children died after B., leaving issue who survived the testator.

Held, that the word "then" referred to the death of the tenant for life, and not to the period of distribution, and that there was an intestacy.

Judgment of Stirling, J., affirmed.—Grant v. Hayham, C.A.—57 L. T. 838.

51. Trust—Condition.—A fund was bequeathed to the Royal National Lifeboat Institution on condition of its constructing and keeping up two lifeboats, with a gift over in the event of non-compliance with the condition.

Held, that the bequest was in the nature of a trust, and that the institution, having accepted the trust, was entitled to an absolute transfer of the fund.—Shuldham v. Royal National Lifeboat Institution, CH.D. CHI., J.—56 L. J. Ch. 794; 57 L. T. 17.

51a. Uncertainty.—A. left all his property upon trust for A. for life, and "from and after his death to pay the same to any niece or female relative of A. provided she marries a person of the name of J. H., residing in the county of T., and who has been born and reared a Roman Catholic, but the said bequest is not to vest in the niece or female relative of A. so marrying a J. H. until five years after the death of A."

Held, that the bequest was void on the ground of uncertainty.—Smithwick v. Hayden, C.A. (Ir.)—19 L. R. Ir. 490.

52. Vesting—Contingent interest—Lapse.—D. devised and bequeathed her real estate and the residue of her personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and, after payment of debts and legacies, to divide the residue of the income of her personal estate and the rents of her real estate until sold into nine equal shares. She disposed of one share upon trust to pay and apply the same towards the maintenance and education of A., B., and C.; and as and when they should respectively attain the ages of twenty-one years, upon trust to pay them in equal shares one-ninth part of such principal, and the dividends and interest which might accrue thereon. A. predeceased the testatrix. B. survived the testatrix but died under the age of twenty-one. C. survived the testatrix and attained the age of twenty-one.

Held, that the gift was contingent and not vested; and that B.'s share lapsed by his death under the age of twenty-one.—Tuke v. Gilbert, CH.D. KAY, J.—57 L. T. 471.

53. Vesting—Portions—"Surviving."—A gift was made by a testator, not standing in loco parentis to his grandchildren, to his daughter for life, and after her death to her children at twenty-one or marriage, with benefit of survivorship in case any died without having obtained a vested interest, and a declaration that, until the vesting of the "portions" thereby provided for the daughter's children, the income was, after her death, to be applied for their maintenance, and, in case of the daughter's death, "without leaving any child or children her surviving," then over. Of the daughter's children two attained twenty-one, and all died in her lifetime unmarried.

Held, that the rule laid down in Emperor v. Rolfe, 1 Ver. sen. 208, that the vested interests of children were not to be divested by their death in their parent's lifetime, although applicable to portions given by will, as well as to cases of settlements, was not applicable to the case of portions to children to whom the testator was not in loco parentis, and that, the terms of the gift being unambiguous, the gift over took effect.—Stephen v. Cunningham, CH.D. KAY, J. 568—38 Ch. D. 183; 58 L. T. 614.

EXECUTION—

54. Attestation—Acknowledgment—Wills Act, 1837, s. 9.—Where a document, bearing upon it the name of the testator, is placed, by or at the request of the testator, before persons who are asked to attest it, and are able to see the signature, there is an acknowledgment within section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837.

Judgment of Butt, J., affirmed.—Daintree v. Fasulo, C.A.—13 P. D. 110; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 76; 58 L. T. 661.

55. Attestation—Codicil—Signatures on opposite page.—A holograph codicil was written on the third side of a sheet of foolscap, of which the first contained the will, drawn up by a solicitor and duly executed. The attestation clause to the codicil was in due form, but reached to the bottom of the page, the signatures of the witnesses to it being opposite to it on the second page, and preceded by the word "Witness." The witnesses, who were clerks in the testator's employment, and in the habit of witnessing papers of the testator, admitted their signatures, but had no recollection of the transaction. The residuary legatee was one of the executors.

The court granted probate of the codicil.—Woodhouse v. Balfour, P.D. & A.D. 368—13 P. D. 2; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 22; 58 L. T. 59.

56. Attestation—Equitable assignment—Donatio mortis causâ.—A., having made his will in 1880, by which he gave the income of his property to his wife B., fell ill in 1887, and, being in anticipation of death, signed the following document:—"1887, March 1.—I give all my insurance money that is coming to me to my wife B. for her own use, as well as £200 in the bank. This is my wish.—A. Witness, C." The document was, at A.'s request, placed with his will, and remained there till his death in April, 1887.

Held, that the document was intended as a testamentary instrument, and, not having been properly attested according to the Wills Act, could not take effect as a will.

Held, also, that effect could not be given to the document as a donatio mortis causâ, or as an immediate assignment of the property therein mentioned.—In re Hughes, C.A. 821.

57. Attestation—Evidence.—Proof of the handwriting of two attesting witnesses to a will containing a due attestation clause and executed in France by a testatrix domiciled in that country, and upon evidence that diligent search has been made, without success, for the attesting witnesses, is sufficient proof that the formalities attending due execution of the will have been complied with.—Bawendale v. De Valmer, CH.D. CHI., J.—57 L. T. 556.

58. Attestation—Presumption of due execution—Parol evidence of witnesses—Wills Act, 1837, s. 9.—Though a will appeared on the face of it to have been duly executed as prescribed by the Wills Act, 1837, and the attestation clause was in full accordance with sections 9 and 10, the court gave effect to the parol evidence of the attesting witnesses, and held that the presumption, Omnia præsumuntur rite et sollemniter esse acta, was rebutted by their evidence, that the will had not been duly executed, and that it could not be admitted to probate.—Glover v. Smith, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 60.

59. Evidence—Presumption of due execution.—A., who was of testamentary capacity, but was ninety-two years old, and blind, and unable to sign his name without assistance, gave directions for a new will to B., who took down the directions by pencil alterations in a former will, which he handed to the solicitor by whom that will had been drawn. B. brought the will, when recopied with the alterations, to A., and at his request D. and E. attended and attested it. H. and K., two servants of A., were also present at the execution. D. and H. were dead, but at the trial E. and K. both swore that the testator signed his name after the attesting witnesses had signed.

By the will B. received a legacy, and was appoi an executor and trustee, with power to receive a c mission.

Held, that due execution of the will must be sumed.—Clery v. Barry, C.A. (Ir.)—21 L. R. Ir. 1

INCORPORATION—

60. Codicil—Letters.—The testatrix the before her death wrote two letters, one addressed friend, with directions as to certain articles to wh she had affixed the names of donees, and the other her executor. In the latter, which was duly attest as a codicil, she mentioned having written the letter.

Held, that the second letter constituted a vali codicil, and incorporated the first letter.—Symes Applebee, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 599.

PROBATE—

61. Administration de bonis non—Death of exe tor—Absence of residuary legatee—Grant to spec legatee.—Where, by the certificate of the chief clerk in an administration action, it appeared th at there no residuary estate, and several letters had been s to the residuary legatee in Canada asking him renounce, the court granted administration de bo non to a specific legatee, without requiring fur citation of the residuary legatee.—In the Goods Wilde, P.D. & A.D. 400—13 P. D. 1; 57 L. J. P. D. A. 7; 57 L. T. 815.

62. Illegible word—Parol evidence.—A. duly executed a will, which was found with the word "one" written in the place of another word. There was no evidence to show when the alteration was made, and the original word was illegible.—Jeffery v. Cancer Hospital, P.D. & A.D.—57 L. T. 600.

63. Mistake—Amendment.—A draft will was duly executed, bequeathing (inter alia) a legacy to the Bristol Royal Infirmary. The testator subsequently executed the will, in which by mistake in the engrossment the legacy was given to the British Royal Infirmary

The court, on proof that there was no such institution as the last-mentioned, granted probate of the will, with the word "Bristol" substituted for "British."—In the Goods of Bushell, P.D. & A.D. 588—13 P. D. 7; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 6; 58 L. T. 54.

64. Two wills—Foreign will—Grant to English executor.—An English testator died in Belgium, having there made a will in English form disposing of his English estate, and a will in Belgian form disposing of his property in Belgium. The executor appointed by the Belgian will having renounced and consented to the present application, the court on motion granted probate of the two wills, as together constituting the last will of the deceased, to he English executor.—In the Goods of Bolton, P.D. & A.D. 287—12 P. D. 202; 57 L. J. P. D. & A. 12.

REVOCATION—

65. Duplicate wills—Presumption of destruction.—Where a will is executed in duplicate, the testator retaining only one copy, which is not found after his death, it will be presumed that such duplicate was destroyed animo revocandi.—Jones v. Harding, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. T. 60.
